Mr. CARLISLE. So much the greater reason why the House should not receive from him a disrespectful paper.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the language objected to does not reflect upon the House. It rather suggests the idea that there might be a combination outside seeking to advance local interests.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the paper, and read as follows:

The eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, to "regulate commerce among the several States," is virtually abrogated, and the very authority under which our legislation is conducted defied by a bill of this nature, which appropriates money for improvements of rivers located wholly within one particular State and of no national importance. In a time of general depression and with the Treasury threatened with a deficit, it is unwise and unjust to the tax-payers to place such a burden, as this bill proposes, upon them.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] raises the point that this is not a question of privilege.

Mr. COX, of New York. On that point I would like to say a few words.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] the Chair is advised, desires to speak upon that point. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] will first state his proposition.

Mr. HALE. The Chair ruled that this paper might be read that the Chair might have knowledge of what was contained in it. Now, the paper having been read, that knowledge has come to the Chair. I have no objection whatever to the gentleman from New York stating the grounds why this is a question of privilege; but he cannot upon that go on and discuss the merits of the bill.

Mr. COX, of New York. I do not intend to do that.

Mr. HALE. To that I would object; because other gentlemen would wish to reply, and the result would be if a speech was allowed to be made with a protest as a part of it, in reference to any bill passed of great or small importance, any member could make a protest and there would be no way of ending any subject-matter. Therefore, upon that ground, I call for the ruling of the Chair upon the question of privilege, whether this is one or not.

Mr. REAGAN. Before the Chair rules I desire to say a few words. In the first place I call attention to the following paragraph in the Digest:

It is not a matter of right and parliamentary privilege to have received and entered upon the Journal a protest of members against the action of the House.

So that the protest is directly in the face of and forbidden by a rule of the House. I call attention to what is found in the Congressional Globe of the proceedings in the Senate on the 14th of August, 1850, being the only case referred to in the Manual, and the only instance in which the question has come up for determination in either branch of Congress except the one referred to by the Speaker yesterday, when there was an unorganized House and when I understand no question was made as to the right of having the protest received and entered. The case in 1850 was upon the bill to admit California as a State of the Union and for other purposes. There is a paper signed by the two Virginia Senators, the two South Carolina Senators, Mr. Turney of Tennessee, Mr. Soulé of Louisiana, Mr. Jefferson Davis of Mississippi, Mr. Atchison of Missouri, and by the two Senators from Florida, protesting against the passage of the bill. Mr. Hunter, who presented this paper, used this language—and when I say Mr. Hunter I speak of one of Virginia's greatest and wisest sons:

I rise not to present a petition, but to address a motion to the courtesy of the Senate—a motion which I am aware I cannot make as a matter of right and parliamentary privilege. It is to ask that a protest, which has been prepared and signed by ten members of this body, against the passage of the bill admitting California into the Union as a State, which passed yesterday, may be received and spread upon the Journals of the Senate. We ask it, because we deem it one of the most, if not perhaps the most important measure that has passed during our experience here, and we wish to give whatever emphasis we legitimately can to our opposition to it. We wish, so far as we can, to break the force of a precedent which we regard as mischievous and dangerous for the admission of States into this Union. I ask that it may be read and spread upon the Journals of the Senate.

Upon that the President of the Senate, who, I believe, was Mr. King, of Alabama, made this decision, after some debate:

The Chair feels some difficulty in deciding a case of this kind where there is objection made. In the Constitution there is nothing to authorize the putting of a protest on the Journal. There never has been a case since the formation of the Government in which a protest has been entered on the Journal. There was at an early period of the Government an attempt made to authorize the entering of protests on the Journal, and it was refused. A motion was made that on the final question upon a bill the opposers of the measure shall have a right to enter a protest and dissent upon the Journal, with the reasons for such dissent and protest, provided that such protest be made within two days after the final passage of the bill. This was July 17, 1789. It was rejected by the vote of the Senate, and there has been no instance that I can find, or that the Secretary has been able to find, on the Journals since that date to show that any such action has been had.

With regard to the protest presented in the case referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts there is nothing on the Journal which shows that the protest was presented and refused. The only thing to be found in the Register of the Debates, in which his colleague at that time is reported to have said—

The Senator's colleague was Mr. Webster—

"And now, had the Constitution secured the privilege of entering a protest upon the Journal I should not say one word on this occasion; although, if what is now proposed shall be accomplished, I know not what would have been the value of such a provision, however formally or carefully it might have been inserted in the body of that instrument. But as there is no such constitutional privilege, I can only effect my purpose by thus addressing the Senate."

The rules of the Senate, I may say, did not forbid such debate after the passing of the bill.

"And I rise, therefore, to make that protest in this manner, in the face of the Senate, and in the face of the country, which I cannot present in any other form."

On that occasion the Senator proceeded to give his reasons why he was opposed to the measure, which opposition would have been in a form of a protest, had the Constitution authorized its being entered upon the Journal. The Chair stated when he rose that he was in doubt whether a single objection would be sufficient to cause him to decide against its being put upon the Journal. He thinks the Senate itself should decide the question.

And then, after a debate which ran through a number of pages, the vote of the Senate was taken upon the proposition to lay the protest on the table, and it was decided in the affirmative by a vote of 22 yeas and 19 nays.

I submit that this is the only case upon record in which such a privilege as is now asked has been accorded, and in that case it was decided against the right to file the protest. The House prescribes its rules of debate and action on bills, and when action has been taken upon a bill and the sense of the members has been expressed either by speech or vote upon the pending measure, the matter is determined; for if one man can be allowed to protest against the bill, then another must be allowed to state his reasons for supporting the bill, and the debate might go on endlessly after the bill has been passed. I believe that under the statement of the gentleman from New York the measure that came before the House for action is placed in an improper light. The gentleman from New York yesterday presented this protest and asked that it be read. His attention was afterward called to it by the Speaker, who said, "Is the Chair to understand it is a protest against the bill?" And the gentleman from New York answered, "It is;" and the Speaker afterward said that the gentleman from New York arose to a question of privilege. Nothing had before been said about its being a question of privilege. Under that idea the gentleman from New York proceeded to ask that the paper be read, not as a protest nominally, but as a question of privilege; and when he stated that he arose to a question of privilege it was manifest from what had preceded that he really sought to enter a protest unwarranted by the Constitution and against the rules of the House and contrary to the decision of the Senate in its grandest and palmiest days. I shall now turn my attention to some of the other points made in this case.

Mr. HOOKER. I rise to a question of order. I ask the Chair if it is proper for a gentleman in this preliminary stage of the proceedings to discuss the merits of the bill? I have no objection to a gentleman speaking upon the point whether this is or is not a question of privilege; but if he intends to discuss the measure, then he anticipates the decision of the Chair as to whether this is a question of privilege or not.

Mr. REAGAN. I am not going to discuss the merits of the bill, but charges have been made against the committee. If it is not our privilege that we shall defend our honor as individuals and defend the honor of the House which passed the bill, then I do not know what a question of privilege can be. Written charges have been made against the action of the committee and against the one hundred and sixty-six members who voted for the passage of this bill. Are we to have our mouths closed and be denied the right to respond to that assault? [Cries of "Good!" "Good!"]

Mr. HOOKER. I should like to have a decision of the Chair as to whether this discussion is in order.

The SPEAKER. The discussion is in order as to the question, whether this is a question of privilege.

Mr. HOOKER. Is it in order to discuss the proposition upon the question whether the protest is privileged?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not so said.

Mr. HOOKER. That is the point I make; until the protest is received by the House, either through the decision of the Chair, or by action of the House, I submit that it is not proper to discuss the contents of the paper. I shall ask to be heard upon the question whether this constitutes a question of privilege.

Mr. REAGAN. Does the gentleman think that when this paper has been read manhood or duty requires the committee to stand still and not reply to its allegations?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas has a right to discuss the question as to whether this is or is not a question of privilege.

Mr. HOOKER. I do not object to the gentleman speaking, but I do object to his speaking until the paper has been received. I cannot see how you can discuss a paper which has not yet been received.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decided that it should be read, and the paper is therefore on record in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and it seems to the Chair that so far as the allegations therein contained are concerned, they are susceptible of debate by the gentleman from Texas. And, furthermore, the gentleman from New York yielded the floor to him.

Mr. REAGAN. The first ground of objection to this bill—

Mr. FORT. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from Illinois cannot take me off the floor when I am speaking.

Mr. FORT. I can when I make a point of order. I understand that the gentleman is proceeding to discuss the merits of the bill, and I inquire of the Chair whether that is in order?

Mr. REAGAN. I am not doing so and I do not propose to do so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is only answering the language used in the paper which has been read.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from Illinois has attacked the committee and he ought not to be so unjust as to insist on shutting the mouths of the committee in reply.

Mr. FORT. I insist that I have not attacked the gentleman, nor have I impugned his motives or the motives of others.

Mr. REAGAN. There is a difference of opinion about that, and that is just what I wish to discuss.

The first objection in the protest is as follows:

The bill contains appropriations to the amount of $7,293,700 and is of such large amount that the rules of the House should not be suspended to facilitate its passage without debate and consideration.

I admit that the bill is a large one and perhaps if I could individually have controlled it it would have been smaller, and I agree that the manner in which the bill came before the House is not a desirable one. I have thought much about the matter to see how we could get action upon the bill without a suspension of the rules. It was stated by the gentleman from New York that if the bill was passed in this way it would create a precedent. The gentleman has been long a member of this House and there are few members so familiar with precedents as he is and he must know the fact that bills of this kind have not passed during the last thirty years without a suspension of the rules; I mean general bills for this purpose. I do not say that they had been regularly passed during the last thirty years in this way, but I do say that from 1866 to the present year they have been so passed at each session without exception, until last year, when no bill was passed.

So that the precedent is established. As to the amount contained in the bill, I desire to call the attention of the House for a moment, without going further back, to the fact that in 1869-'70, Congress appropriated for this purpose $3,947,900; in 1870-'71 it appropriated $4,407,500; in 1871-'72 it appropriated $5,588,000; in 1872-'73 it appropriated $6,102,900; in 1873-'74 it appropriated $5,193,000; in 1874-'75 it appropriated $6,643,517.50, about a half million less than in this bill; and in 1875-76 it appropriated $5,015,000. In all of these cases and many preceding the bills were passed through this House under a suspension of the rules without debate.

At the last session of the last Congress the river and harbor bill did not receive a two-third vote and failed to pass. Consequently the public works were greatly the sufferers, as we learn through the proper official channels and by personal knowledge on account of the failure to pass that bill. So much, then, for the precedents. We are simply following established precedents, not of a pleasing kind I admit, but precedents fully established, and therefore the arguments rest against the whole system, and not against this particular bill.

I would say also in relation to this part of the protest that the bill for rivers and harbors having failed last year the public works seriously suffered for want of appropriations. If the amount appropriated by this bill had been divided between last year, when none was made, and this, they would have amounted to about three and a half millions annually, which would be much below the average of appropriations for this purpose. Some members of the committee and many members of the House sought to have the amount increased above the average, because of the failure of the bill last year and of the injury done to great public works in consequence of that failure, so that they might be restored and proceeded with.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. For what period of time does this bill appropriate?

Mr. REAGAN. It appropriates for one year; but there has been a year for which there was no appropriation.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. In fact it covers two years.

Mr. REAGAN. It covers two years; that is, it is all the appropriations that are made for two years. In connection with this I desire to say a word, if not objected to. Gentlemen will remember that in the report that comes from the Bureau of Statistics on the internal commerce of the United States it is stated that the internal commerce of this country amounts to from twenty-five to thirty billions of dollars annually; they will see that anything which will reduce the cost of transportation one-fourth of 1 per cent. will give back to the people a revenue or a saving infinitely larger than the amount of this appropriation.

There may be reasons which perhaps do not occur at present to the gentlemen from New York [Mr. Cox] why this appropriation should be made and why those who attempt to comprehend the commercial and material interests of the country, who take a broader and more comprehensive view and possibly a wiser view of the subject, should favor the passage of this bill.

Another thing. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Cox] I believe is understood to be the special friend of the laboring-man. Of all the bills that pass through this House this is the only one in these times of depression and pecuniary distress that goes directly to the people, that gives them employment, that pays them for it by improving the commercial facilities of the country, increasing the profits of the producers from the soil, and reduces the expenses of those who consume those products. That is all I desire to say on that subject.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. REAGAN. Wait a moment; I am not through yet.

Mr. COX, of New York. The gentleman is speaking in my time.

Mr. REAGAN. The second proposition of the protest which is made here as the ground of opposition to this bill is as follows:

2. All our rules, and especially Rule 121, specially applicable to appropriations for works of internal improvement, are intended to guard against a vote in gross on such appropriations, and require, for wise purposes, separate votes on each item under certain conditions. We protest against the infraction of so salutary a rule on a bill where the tendency is to combine for general spoliation upon the Treasury.

That language, I believe, has been modified by the gentleman from New York when the point of order was made against it. I did not wish to see him disciplined for it, for I regarded it as one of his figures of speech. He certainly did not mean to charge a combination for spoliation upon the Treasury against members of the committee who reported the bill or the one hundred and sixty-six members of the House who voted for its passage. Rule 121, to which reference is here made, is a good and salutary rule. I would be glad if it could be enforced on the river and harbor bill as well as on every other. But we are confronted with the practical fact that if the river and harbor bill should be reported to this House and referred to the Committee of the Whole, where it would be open to debate and amendment, it could not come out of that committee in such a shape as would enable any member to vote for it. I believe that fact may be assumed; hence it is that we have to pursue this extraordinary course.

But the vote yesterday was to suspend Rule 121 and all other rules, so as to take the sense of the House by a two-third majority as to whether this bill should be passed. The bill had been reported, printed, and laid on the table of member for weeks before they were called upon to vote on it. They had the means of knowing all its provisions, except some few items, embracing about $160,000, which had been added to the bill after it had been reported. Therefore it cannot be said that any member was surprised.

I can have no objection to members exercising their judgment in disapproving a bill or the method by which it was proposed to pass it; that is their individual and representative right; but I do object that they should put in their statements that which is equivalent to charging that there was a fraudulent and corrupt combination to plunder the Treasury for local benefit. The members of the committee considered this bill day after day and week after week for two or three months. They heard every member of the House who chose to come before it, some of the Senators, and many delegations from different parts of the country. They examined the two volumes of the reports of engineers and all the information which they could obtain in relation to these matters while they were engaged in the formation of this bill.

I state in the presence of all these members that I never yet asked a living man to vote for this bill and I never intimated to a living man that if his State or section received an appropriation he was expected to vote for the bill. On the contrary, the bill contains appropriations for parts of the country whose Representatives were known to be opposed to the bill.

Now, I want to call attention to a remarkable fact. One gentleman came before us asking for about $1,000,000 for improvements in which his State was interested. This request was made after the bill had been matured. We gave him more than $160,000, and he now signs the protest against this bill because of its extravagance! [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. PAGE. Can the gentleman name a similar case of any other member?

Mr. REAGAN. I do not mean to be personal. Another member asked for $400,000—a hundred and fifty thousand dollars more than the estimate. We gave him $50,000, and now he signs the protest against the bill on account of its extravagance! [Laughter and applause and cries of "Name him!"]

Another gentleman came to us asking an increase of a certain appropriation, and we increased it; and now he is so patriotic that he votes against the bill because it is a "plundering" bill.

These are samples. I might go on with them; but I will only say that the real explanation of the hostility on the part of some gentlemen (I do not say all) to this bill is that we have not "plundered the Treasury" enough. If we had followed the estimates we would have appropriated not less than fifteen or sixteen millions.

Mr. SPARKS. Will the gentleman allow me a moment? I ask him to state to the House the names of the gentlemen signing the protest to whom he has referred.

Mr. REAGAN. I will not because I do not propose to say anything personal. I state what I know and what all the members of the committee know and what gentlemen themselves know.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. REAGAN. I decline to be interrupted. I was stating that if we had appropriated the amount estimated for by the engineer department the aggregate of the bill would have been sixteen or eighteen million dollars. Again, if we had consented to appropriate in this bill the amount urged upon us by various members, some of whom appealed to us to go beyond the estimates—

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to ask the gentleman a question affecting the rights of members of this floor.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me; I will be through in a few minutes.

Mr. MITCHELL. I wish to inquire whether the remarks which the gentleman made in regard to certain members of this House related only to those who signed the protest or to those who voted against the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas declines to be interrupted and is entitled to proceed without interruption.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then I will call the gentleman to order through the Speaker.

Mr. FORT. Has the gentleman from Texas a right to discuss the merits of the bill?

Mr. REAGAN. I call the gentleman to order. [Laughter.]

Mr. MITCHELL. I believe I have precedence in calling the gentleman to order. I understood him to say that certain members of this House had asked of the committee of which he is chairman certain appropriations and that those members had voted against the bill. I wish to know whether that statement related to any member who did not sign the protest.

Mr. REAGAN. I did not hear the gentleman's statement.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask whether that statement of the gentleman related to any member who did not sign the protest.

Mr. REAGAN. I have stated all I have to say on that subject; and I do not care to continue the discussion.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, Mr. Speaker, I insist as a matter of right upon having this question settled; for as I understood the remark of the gentleman from Texas, it was a reflection upon every member who voted against the bill. I am not personally interested in the bill one way or the other; but I understood the gentleman to make a remark here affecting all members who voted against this bill—

Mr. REAGAN. I call the gentleman to order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL] raises a question of order, and objects to certain language used by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. MITCHELL. I understand the gentleman from Texas has withdrawn his statement so far as it might have been understood to apply to others than those who signed the protest. I understood the gentleman to reflect upon every member of the House who voted against the bill. There are certain members who he states appeared before the committee and asked appropriations. Now, I desire to state that I asked no such appropriation, and yet I voted against the bill. If I understood correctly the gentleman's original remark, it would reflect upon me and my honor in that respect.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think the gentleman from Texas made any remarks reflecting on the House or on the gentleman.

Mr. REAGAN. I beg that I may be permitted to proceed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is speaking, as he stated when he rose, by permission of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.] How much time he has the Chair is unable to say.

Mr. COX, of New York. I limit the gentleman to five minutes more.

Mr. REAGAN. I beg pardon; the gentleman from New York cannot fix my time now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has fifteen minutes remaining.

Mr. COX, of New York. I retain the floor, and am entitled to resume it whenever I choose. I was extending my courtesy to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. REAGAN. The House will give the gentleman all the time he may want. I did not know I was speaking in the gentleman's time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas stated himself, when he took the floor, that it had been yielded to him by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COX, of New York. I have given the gentleman all my time but fifteen minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has fifteen minutes remaining.

Mr. BURCHARD. The gentleman from Texas took the floor on a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman out of his own mouth stated he was on the floor through the courtesy of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. REAGAN. The Speaker misunderstands me. I asked the gentleman from New York to give way to me to speak first, and that then he could answer me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas could not get the floor unless the gentleman yielded to him.

Mr. REAGAN. I took the floor, and was willing to give him the floor to reply to me.

Mr. ITTNER. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. REAGAN. I hope by unanimous consent I may be allowed to finish, and the gentleman from New York can get unanimous consent to follow me.

Mr. ITTNER, (in a loud tone of voice.) Mr. Speaker. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri. Does the gentleman rise to a point of order?

Mr. ITTNER. I merely wish to remark that I do not think there will be any disposition on the part of the House to take the time consumed by the gentleman from Texas out of the time allowed to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. REAGAN. We will get him all the time that he may desire, and I hope I may be allowed to proceed.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the gentleman from Texas will proceed.

Mr. REAGAN. I was proceeding to say, Mr. Speaker, that if we had appropriated the amount of money sought by the members themselves and urged upon us from day to day, our bill would have been more than $15,000,000, instead of $7,000,000. We have not in the minds of most of those who came before us, all of them I might say, given them all they think they ought to have. I do not think any of them got quite as much as they sought. Protests, nevertheless, are made against our action on account of our not giving them as much as they asked; protests on the ground of our having given them too much when they know we have not given them as much as they sought.

Now, sir, we intended as a general rule in reference to these appropriations to give about 40 per cent. on the amount of each estimate. We went above that percentage in many instances, but that was the rule we adopted. The committee was urged with great ability and zeal to grant the whole of many appropriations in accordance with the estimates, and the most difficult of all the duties devolved upon the committee was to keep down appropriations instead of getting them up.

Now, in regard to the charge of a combination, I have only this to say, speaking for myself, that I never inquired in considering the measure whether the member in whose district the work for which an appropriation was made would vote for the bill or not. I never asked a member to vote for the bill. My idea was to get a bill which would be just and equitable and submit it afterward, when printed, to the judgment of the House to determine whether it was a just or equitable bill or not.

It is also urged as one of the grounds of the protest that we appropriated money for the improvement of rivers which had no water. I am sure that suggestion came from a failure to know what rivers were appropriated for and their capacity.

Now, what make the large aggregate in the bill are not appropriations for local objects, for small rivers and harbors, but for great national works of improvement in the country. For instance, we give $350,000 for removing obstructions in East River and Hell Gate, New York, the entrance to our greatest commercial city. We appropriate $150,000 for the improvement of Harlem River and to give additional wharfage and facility for handling the grain and other produce of the West. We appropriate $100,000 to improve Detroit River. We appropriate over $100,000 for a harbor of refuge on Lake Michigan, for the protection of the vast shipping of the lakes. We appropriate $175,000 for Sault Ste. Marie Canal; certainly not too much for a work of that magnitude, to accommodate the vast commerce of the lakes. We appropriate in one item $250,000 for the improvement of the Mississippi River from the mouth of the Illinois to the mouth of the Ohio. We appropriate for other objects specified $100,000 to improve the Mississippi River from the Des Moines Rapids to the mouth of the Ohio. We appropriate $250,000 to improve the navigation of the Mississippi and deepen its channel from Saint Paul to Des Moines Rapids. We appropriate $150,000 for the Mississippi and Arkansas Rivers below the mouth of the Ohio. We appropriate $300,000 for the improvement of the Ohio River. We appropriate $300,000 for the Tennessee River and to build the great canal around the Muscle Shoals. These and like appropriations included in this bill are for great national works of the most vital importance to the United States. The whole country will receive the benefit of the larger portion of these appropriations, and if gentlemen will look to the appropriations for the smaller rivers and harbors they will find them to be as low as they have been in any bill of money yet passed.

Not to tax the patience of the House further, I will come now to the last point alleged by the gentleman from New York in his protest. It is urged by him in the protest against the passage of the river and harbor bill that it is unconstitutional, because it provides for the improvement of rivers wholly within the territory of a single State. I presume the gentleman who made that statement is a lawyer, and if he is I wish to show him that if he is right the Supreme Court of the United States and a number of other courts in the land are stupidly ignorant of what the law is.

I happen to have it collated and right before me in some remarks that I delivered last year; and I will read from those remarks certain conclusions deduced from the decisions of the courts. I shall read these first and then I shall give a statement of the decisions; after which I shall cease to trespass upon the time of the House. I laid down these as maxims of law established by the highest courts in the land:

First. That all rivers are navigable in law which are navigable in fact.

Second. That they are public navigable waters in fact when they are used, or are susceptible of being used, in their ordinary condition, as highways of commerce, over which trade and travel are or may be conducted in the customary modes of trade and travel on water.

Third. That the doctrine of the common law as to the navigability of waters has no application in this country.

Fourth. That the ebb and flow of the tides do not constitute the test of the navigability of waters in this country.

Fifth. That they constitute navigable waters of the United States within the meaning of the acts of Congress, in contradistinction from navigable waters of the States, when they form in their ordinary condition by themselves or by uniting with other waters a continued highway over which commerce is or may be carried on with other States or foreign countries in the customary modes in which commerce is conducted by water.

Sixth. That the true test as to whether Congress can appropriate money for such works is, whether the object be of local character and local use or whether it be of general use to the States.

Seventh. If it be purely local, Congress cannot appropriate money for it; but, if it be general, it matters not whether in point of locality it be in one State or several, or whether it be of large or small extent; its nature and character determine the right.

I now read extracts from some of the decisions of the courts and from elementary authority.

In the case of the General Cass, in United States district court for eastern district of Michigan, January term, 1872, Mr. Justice Long-yeon says:

Those waters are navigable in law which are navigable in fact, and they are public navigable waters in fact when they are used or are susceptible of being used in their ordinary condition as highways of commerce, or over which trade and travel are or may be conducted in the customary modes of trade and travel on water.

And he adds:

That the Saginaw River (in Michigan) from Saginaw City to its mouth, upon which the towage services are claimed to have been rendered, fully answers the description above given, there can be no dispute. It is therefore public, navigable water, and is clearly within the admiralty jurisdiction of this court.—American Law Times Reports, volume 5, page 13.

This river was navigable about forty miles and wholly within the State of Michigan.

In the case of Daniel Ball, in the Supreme Court of the United States, Mr. Justice Field, delivering the opinion of the court, (December term, 1870,) says, (and he is a strict constructionist:)

The doctrine of the common law as to the navigability of waters has no application in this country. Here the ebb and flow of the tide do not constitute the usual test, as in England, or any test at all of the navigability of waters.

After giving the reasons for this, he adds:

These rivers must be regarded as public, navigable rivers in law which are navigable in fact. And they are navigable in fact when they are used, or susceptible of being used, in their ordinary condition, as highways for commerce, over which trade and travel are or may be conducted in the customary modes of trade and travel on water. And they constitute navigable waters of the United States within the meaning of the acts of Congress, in contradistinction from the navigable waters of the States, when they form in their ordinary condition by themselves, or by uniting with other waters a continued highway over which commerce is or may be carried on with other States or foreign countries in the customary modes in which commerce is conducted by water.—10 Wallace, 563.

Mr. Justice Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, section 1273 of the edition of 1873, in treating the question of the appropriation of money for internal improvements, says:

The true test is, whether the object be of a local character and local use, or whether it be of general use to the States. If it be purely local, Congress cannot constitutionally appropriate money for the object. But, if it be general, it matters not whether in point of locality it be in one State or several; whether it be of large or small extent; its nature and character determine the right, and Congress may appropriate money in aid of it, for it is then, in a just sense, for the general welfare.

These authorities, and others of like kind, and these deductions settle the law, if any question can be settled by the adjudications of the highest courts, against the proposition of the gentleman from New York. And if he looks to the bill he will find there is no work appropriated for that does not come within the provisions of these definitions of the law as made by the supreme and circuit and district courts of the United States.

The portions of this protest which have for their object to impeach the patriotism and integrity of the committee which framed the bill and the patriotism and integrity of the members of the House who voted for it are not, it strikes me, words to be said upon this floor by any member of another. That committee is constituted of eleven members, representing different sections of the country, the conflicting interests of the different portions of the entire country, each standing guard upon the other that no one gets appropriations for particular works or for a particular section which would be inequitable or unjust. I do not know whether I should say it or not, but if I am permitted to speak for the members of the committee and not myself, I would say that the committee labored, under their convictions of duty, to give an honest bill, appropriating money where it was needed, and steadily refused to appropriate money where it would be merely an expenditure of money without benefiting the commerce of the country.

If I have ever served upon a committee that labored faithfully, diligently, and earnestly, I believe that this committee did it. I feel after three months of solid, undeviating, almost ceaseless toil in maturing a bill that gave us very great labor that the committee is at least entitled to be regarded as having tried to do its duty without being impeached by charges of combination and conspiracy for local interests to plunder the Treasury of the United States. If gentlemen can reconcile it to their own sense of justice to make such charges against their associates who framed the bill and against their associates who voted to pass the bill, let them do it; I have nothing to say about it.

Mr. Speaker, I have occupied more of the time of the House than I expected to do. I know that I have not done justice to the subject, but I feel that I ought not to take up any more of the time of the House.

Mr. COX, of New York. The gentleman from Texas need not have gone out of his way to affix an allegation of censure upon his committee. There was none growing out of this protest, except that which is plainly expressed of a public nature. There was no intention to call in question the honest intention and purpose of the gentleman and his committee. We grant that gentlemen here, upon all sides, act honestly according to their own belief. It is a part of the courtesy of our duty. When this committee brought in this bill they no doubt believed that they were acting in the public interest. Certainly, they thought it was in the interest of their own constituents, however it may affect others.

Admitting all this, am I censurable if I claim the right, if possible, by this protest to reform this bad and too common practice of legislation, which the mode of passing this bill illustrates? Does it follow that in doing so I am impugning the honesty or integrity of the gentlemen who so ably represent the House on the Committee on Commerce?

This practice has not, as has been said, been uniform of passing river and harbor bills by a two-third vote on Monday. We have had such bills, like other appropriation bills, often discussed, and with advantage.

Moreover, may I not say to gentlemen who are interested in this bill that they will in the end get more money, better applied, with less taxation justly levied, by fair discussions here, than by grinding such bills through by a two-third vote, with no challenge to wrong items and no amendment for any purpose? What do you do? Send this measure to the Senate to be riddled and ridiculed, torn to tatters and patched all over; and then to come out of a committee of conference changed in its items, sometimes for the worse, or, in the end, as was the case with some recent bills of this character, vetoed. It is not for the interest of localities or the country to drive the bill through under the whip and spur. Such hasty and ill-considered action recoils.

I did not intend to debate the merits of the bill; I intended to call attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that in the nature of a question of privilege the opportunity has frequently arisen here of presenting protests. The case is pertinent, referred to by the Speaker yesterday, when Mr. Brooks presented a protest as to the organization of the House. That protest was accepted by the House so far as reading and printing in the RECORD. I also remember the case of the contested election of a member from Louisiana, Mr. Sypher; he had been admitted though not elected. While he was out of the House telegraphing home that he was admitted to his seat, I drew up a protest. It was signed by some twenty-five members. It was sent to the Clerk's desk without discussion, opposition, or comment. It was read; a motion to reconsider was entertained; and thereupon Mr. Sypher was debarred from membership.

Reference has been made to the case which occurred in the Senate in the Thirty-first Congress. In that case a protest was made by eminent Senators against the admission of California. True, the question was whether the protest should go, not into the record, but into the Journal. Mr. Hunter, reasoning philosophically upon the nature of such presentments, then said:

It does seem to me that there are occasions when members should be permitted thus to emphasize their opposition to a measure.

That is all intended by this protest. This bill was passed without discussion. We would emphasize our adverse unexpressed judgment to such a pernicious practice. Being debarred the usual debate, how else can we do it? We know that it contains an enormous and multifarious appropriation of money. We had no chance to show how inordinate some sections and localities were fed by this bill, and how others were compelled to pay for it without adequate consideration. In the bill Alabama gets less than half of Arkansas, and Connecticut less than Alabama; Florida twice that of Delaware, and Indiana only half of Illinois; Iowa but $28,000, being one-tenth of Georgia, while Kansas received almost as meager a sum as Louisiana with her great commercial entrepôt; and each of these States a score less than Michigan with her bountiful $569,000, which is ten times the slim Massachusetts bounty, with its many harbors on her coast. We know why New York should receive attention in these matters; but why should New Jersey get $246,000 while New Hampshire gets $4,400? Compare Ohio with her $180,000, and North Carolina with her $135,000, and Pennsylvania with her $358,000, Tennessee with her $461,000, Texas with her $283,000, Virginia with her $210,000, West Virginia with her $272,000, and then as a climax Wisconsin with $408,000, and you will be prepared to say what influences led to these varied sums for these peculiar localities. It does not appear to be a sectional bill. The North had in the printed bill $3,789,300, and the South $2,332,500, so that there is perfect impartiality in the general drain of money for such purposes. It is irrespective of any special favor on account of previous condition. But surely debate might have aided Congress to apportion more discreetly, if not to lessen, these sums according to the needs of commerce and the ability of the people to be taxed.

But there was no chance for comparison, debate, or deliberation on any one of the hundreds of items of the bill. We know that it was what in common parlance is called an omnibus bill, a log-rolling bill. The gentleman from Texas showed us that members came to him or his committee again and again to have amounts inserted or enlarged. Nay, it is asserted here that some of those who voted against the bill and signed the protest yesterday did so because they did not get the amounts they asked for. Does not this show that there is a tendency in such bills, as is shown in this protest, to combine for the exhaustion of the Treasury? Yes, and a tendency to fight when one is left out of the combination.

I shall now read from certain authorities to sustain the point of privilege in presenting the protest. I read first from Wilson's Parliamentary Law, on page 163, where it is said:

The entering of protests prevails in all of our legislative assemblies, and is generally regulated and secured by constitutional provisions.

On the next page the author says:

Members may not only express their opinion by vote, but also, with the grounds of it, by protest, which, with the names of all the members who concur in it, is entered in the Journal.

This rule is summarized in Cushing's Parliamentary Practice, where the protest is recognized generally as a parliamentary privilege, of great utility in the science of legislation.

Now, sir, I have an extract from the constitution of the State of Michigan upon this subject.

Mr. CONGER. The constitution of the State of Michigan provides that members of the Legislature may protest.

Mr. COX, of New York. I will come to that in a moment. It has been the custom in various States, as Cushing remarks, to admit protests both inside and outside of the organic law. The constitution of Michigan says:

Any member of either house shall have liberty to dissent from or protest against any act, proceeding, or resolution which he may think injurious to any person of the public, and have the reason for his dissent entered upon the Journal.

This goes to any act, proceeding, or resolution injurious to the public or to any person. It is an extensive privilege. We do not propose to enter this protest on the Journal. In the interest of the public we rise to a question of high privilege, not only to reserve the constitutional rights of Congress against the wrongful use of public money, but, if possible, to stop an insidious and, I was about to say, a corrupt system by the combination of localities against the Federal exchequer and the national interests. Is not such an attempt as this protest worthy of commendation from unselfish men bent on the common weal and not scared by mere local clamor?

There is a propriety, as well by acknowledged right as by custom of this House, to have the reasons emphasized by having them spread upon the record. This proceeding, I know, is post mortem. It is after the bill has passed the House and on its way to the Senate. But we cannot help that. Our protest looks to the future, and is in the interest of good legislation.

I could refer also to Alabama, where in her constitution the right of protest has been authorized, as follows:

Any member of either house shall have liberty to dissent from or protest against any act or resolution which he may think injurious to the public or an individual, and have the reasons for his dissent entered on the journal.

So in Florida, Iowa, New Hampshire, Vermont, North Carolina, Ohio, Tennessee, and in Illinois, where two members signing a protest may call the attention of the public or of the house to a flagrant violation of parliamentary rules or to the unwisdom of the proposed legislation against which the protest is offered. So much for that branch of the case.

The gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] to whom I yielded the floor, has entered upon an elaborate discussion of this bill as to its merits. We should have had it before its passage. I cannot avoid, though reluctantly, following him to some extent; but I will endeavor to be guarded as to how far. The bill will not bear much discussion. Was that the reason it was rushed through here without debate? Why was it placed here in this House to be put in a machine and to come out just as they brought it in? One honorable member, whom I have in my eye, gave me the reason yesterday. He voted for the bill, but said he did not like it; he voted for it because there was some money in it for his State. I will not mention names, either; but said he, "When we get a bill with only $5,000,000 in it, it is generally lost. You have to put $5,000,000 in it and distribute it pretty evenly in order to make it carry. But when you have $7,000,000 in it, it is a sure thing; two-thirds will vote for it." This is a pregnant commentary on such legislation; but we know it is all too true.

And yet I have to stand here with my friends who have signed this protest and submit to the harsh language of gentlemen who are also friends, because I dare, in the line of dutiful yet unavailing remonstrance, to protest against this specious practice of appropriating money without deliberation. Nor am I amenable to any selfish charge, as my State has large appropriations in the bill, running up to $753,000, Hell Gate included.

This bill only needs a little examination to show of what it is made. There are propositions here for surveys, $140,000. For surveys? What are they but the entering wedge for future appropriations? I find in it propositions for surveying rivers in States where there are perhaps scarcely any navigable water courses, where I have been told that even men cannot get water when they dig a hole in the ground to boil potatoes. There is a provision here for the survey of a river in Kentucky, which a friend of mine near me says ought to be macadamized. [Laughter.] That is the only way to make it a thoroughfare. [Laughter.]

Mr. REAGAN. Is that the member who asked that it be inserted in the bill?

Mr. COX, of New York. No, it is a gentleman who opposes this questionable legislation on principle. He does not ask, he scorns to ask, for an appropriation at the expense of good legislation and fair precedents. He is with me here in protesting. I cannot get my eye on him just at this time, but he has filled the second office in the State of Kentucky and is a parliamentarian of approved skill and ability. His approbation of this protest is consolation enough for being with the minority.

Further than that, here are provisions for the survey of all sorts of little rivers, whose currents are local to States or districts of a State. I am somewhat of a traveler, if not a geographer; I have traveled pretty nearly all through our country. I have been to the State of Texas. With its bayous and large extent of sea-coast, I know there is some excuse for gentlemen there who have obtained $23,000 of this appropriation. I will not complain of that, nor of the gentleman for looking to it. The population is largely a commercial people; their bayous run away up into the land. They are arms of the sea, and much is to be said for them of a general nature.

But if you would learn some of the prime merits of this bill go farther inland, where you find little "goose-creeks," trout streams, and almost waterless rivers, which are dry half the year. In some of these waters you can hardly find water enough to run a mill-race; and if you should undertake to go out and find anything of utility on some of these streams, to find a mill-site for instance, some one will tell you the old story, that you "Can't find a dam by a mill-site, and no mill by a dam site." [Laughter.] Many of the creeks and rivers in this bill are not worth a dam. [Great laughter.] If you examine them carefully you will find that there is not water enough in them to run the year round; and hence the sequitur of our logicians, that there is greater necessity of making an appropriation! They are navigable "by law," according to certain authorities, and the effort of this bill is to make them navigable in fact!

Some years ago an honorable member of Congress from Ohio, now upon the supreme bench of this District, Judge Cartter, brought in an amendment to appropriate $10,000 for the Tuscarawas River, which runs into the Muskingum, and the Muskingum River runs into the Ohio River. It joins with another creek to make the Muskingum at Coshocton, in the district of my honorable friend, [Mr. SOUTHARD.] It is the place where I had the happiness and honor to be born. I have many associations with "the banks of that beautiful river," the Muskingum. What was my surprise to find this stream, already improved at a great outlay by the State by dams, locks, and slack-water, for stern-wheelers, in this bill. What could be the reason for that appropriation? The Muskingum is hardly over a hundred and fifty miles from Coshocton to Marietta, all in one State. Perhaps it was the same reason Judge Cartter gave for one of its tributaries, the Tuscarawas, for which he asked a ten thousand, ironical, appropriation. He urged that it had been navigable since the deluge; that the Indians had had their canoes upon it, which ran both up and down on its bosom; that it was necessary as a tributary to the Muskingum; that the Muskingum poured its stream into the Ohio; that the Ohio gave its volumes to the Mississippi; and the father himself of waters gave his rolling flood to the everlasting ocean. This was the grand climax: that, therefore, Congress should give $10,000 to the Tuscarawas River. [Laughter.] That is the nature of the argument that must be made here for most of these items.

Why, sir, everybody knows that in the good old days of strict construction of the Constitution, when we had southern statesmen here to defend the canons of interpretation of our sacred political faith; when they discriminated between national objects like "inland seas" and merely local objects like county creeks and State streams; when they had the power to enforce their philosophical rules of criticism upon all appropriations according to the meaning and intent of those who founded the Federal system—in those days—ante bellum days, if you please—no such argumentation as that made by the active and energetic gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] would ever have been tolerated. Gentlemen of the South, have those days gone to the rear and abyss forever? Are we to have no more of the strict construction of our Constitution and the rigid economies which such construction taught? Or are we to float on a limitless sea of legislation, or, worse, a mercenary element which, when it stagnates, becomes death to our institutions? I do not say that the great body of these appropriations in this bill belongs to the South. I have shown that it does not. Michigan, West Virginia, and Wisconsin get their big and respective shares. Why, we can tell the size of it in a moment when we see a gentleman from a favored State leap up in the air from his place and object to this protest. Minnesota gets her share; Wisconsin gets her share; Ohio, along the lakes, gets her share; Louisiana has her little share. All around, even in New England, there are nice little douceurs given for gentlemen in nearly every part of the country. This is a pretty arrangement.

Mr. REAGAN. New York gets more than any two of them.

Mr. COX, of New York. Yes; and I oppose this bill, although you appropriate so much to New York.

Mr. KENNA. How about your district?

Mr. COX, of New York. My district is in one sense the United States of America. [Laughter.] But my friend from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] gets $240,000 for the Big Kanawha and $18,000 for the Little Kanawha. There is where his district comes in; and he supports the bill! He had better not interrupt me any more.

Mr. KENNA. I do not think the gentleman knows in whose district those streams are. A little knowledge of geography would help him wonderfully.

Mr. COX, of New York. Now, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, this protest is in no sense offensive. It only calls the attention of the House and the country to a species of legislation that ought to be corrected; a species of legislation vicious beyond demonstration, even in full debate. The protest simply refers to the large amount involved in the bill and the propriety of its consideration according to a special rule made for the consideration of the items in bills of this kind, and that these appropriations should not be considered en bloc. Then it refers to our time-honored privilege in this House to debate these appropriation bills in Committee of the Whole and out of it. Then it comes down to the constitutional idea that the General Government was established for general purposes; that the States should take care of their local interests, and that in these regards there should be a line of demarcation strictly drawn.

Mr. Speaker, although this debate may go to the merits of the bill, and although the bill may not appear quite so presentable as before analyzed and protested, and although the bill as printed is not the same bill as written, although the bill now goes to the Senate baptized by the two-third, reasonable rule, I hope the Senate, with the aid of both parties and fair debate, will eliminate all the errors, all the "log-rolling" from it, and give us a bill that will inure to the benefit of such commercial interests as are under the Federal authority and at the same time protect our rightful immunity under the Constitution from unjust taxation at a time when the country suffers beyond example.

I now yield to the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. ELLIS.]

Mr. ELLIS. I would not now claim the attention of the House but for the fact that the chairman of the Committee on Commerce [Mr. REAGAN] in the course of his remarks alluded to certain gentlemen who had appeared before the committee and whom his nice sense of parliamentary propriety would not permit him to name; and a cry went up from a hundred lips, made brave in their utterances perhaps because they were numerous, "Name him!" Were it not for this fact I would not now claim the attention of the House. In response to that cry, "Name him!" "Name him!" I respond, his name is "ELLIS;" he hails from Louisiana; and he confronts you now with words of which he is not ashamed and with thoughts that will bear the keen scrutiny of his watching countrymen.

In regard to this protest, Mr. Speaker, which has occasioned all this debate, I cannot for my life see why any one should object to it; the offensive language has been withdrawn, and I for one say that in signing it I meant no reflection upon the chairman of the Committee on Commerce nor upon any of the members of that committee, (most of whom I am proud to claim as my personal friends,) nor upon any gentleman who saw fit to vote for the bill.

Mr. Speaker, look at the protest. What is there in it, unless it be the enunciation of principles enshrined in the Constitution and made sacred by American usage? What is the first point made? It is that this bill appropriates the sum of $7,000,000 and that the measure is hurried through without discussion and without the chance for that sharp, close investigation which members should ever bestow upon any measure which sweeps away the money of the people. We live in a broad country: four thousand miles one way and two thousand the other. It is impossible that members of this House can be familiar with the physical geography of all these rivers in the different States. Discussion clears away the mists. Truth is like a torch: the more you shake it the more it shines. Investigation affects injuriously only the guilty, never the innocent. When the people's money is to be voted away, when $7,000,000 are to be appropriated, how strange, Mr. Speaker, that we, sent here to legislate for the country, with the whole summer before us, ay, even until December, if need be, to transact the legitimate business of the country, should shrink from full investigation and discussion of this important measure.

Mr. ROBERTS. I ask my friend to yield to me one minute simply for a question.

Mr. ELLIS. With great pleasure I yield to my friend for a question.

Mr. ROBERTS. The gentleman has signed a protest here in regard to a certain practice which has prevailed in this House for a long series of years and has received the sanction of very many very good men—even of one so good as himself. I ask the gentleman in this connection whether he will not consent to have read the names attached to this protest and also the names of those who voted in the affirmative upon the last river and harbor bill which came before the House and was passed in the same way?

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, that is not a question, and I do not yield for it.

Mr. ROBERTS. It will occupy only a very few minutes.

Mr. ELLIS. I do not yield. My friend from Maryland, having obtained consent to ask me a question, tries to inject into my speech a portion of the record of the last Congress, and I decline to yield for that purpose.

Mr. ROBERTS. I have no doubt it will confirm all the gentleman has said.

Mr. ELLIS. Then, sir, I will answer you thus; and I will make confession which a good many of the gentlemen on this floor will have to make before their constituents next November. I was young and green then and did not pay attention to the real contents of that bill as I should have done.

Mr. ROBERTS. My friend should go further and make confession, as this is a day of confession, that he came to me and asked to get $250,000 for the harbor at New Orleans and $200,000 for Red River, instead of the amount appropriated.

Mr. ELLIS. I will come to that; I will pay my respects to that thought before I close; the gentleman need not be afraid. There beats nothing here in my heart in regard to the public interest which he and every citizen in this great Republic cannot look at and welcome. Now, sir, as to the second point of the protest. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

2. All our rules, and especially Rule 121, specially applicable to appropriations for works of internal improvement, are intended to guard against a vote in gross on such appropriations, and require, for wise purposes, separate votes on each item, under certain conditions. We protest against the infraction of so salutary a rule on a bill where the tendency is to combine for general spoliation upon the Treasury.

Retracting for myself the word "spoliation," Mr. Speaker, which was used there when I signed that protest, I ask could any rule be more salutary? I ask could any rule guard against combinations for large appropriations of this kind where the individual interests of the respective district, the interests of each member, are aggregated in the whole bill, each member fighting for his district alone but leaving out of sight for the moment the general weal of the whole country? This rule was made to meet that very spirit of log-rolling in which members meet to make up bills of this kind. Now I ask the Clerk to read the third point in the protest.

The Clerk read as follows:

2. The right of the House of Representatives to consider appropriations in Committee of the Whole House, or at least in the House itself, should be sacredly protected. This suspension of the rule deprives this House of our traditional privilege; and this encourages similar raids upon the Treasury to gratify local interests.

Mr. ELLIS. Certainly, sir. The privilege of discussing an immense appropriation in the Committee of the Whole, the privilege of examining into the claims of the little creeks and into small rivers in the country, and especially of some in Pennsylvania the very names of which the Speaker of this House is ignorant of, the names of which I do not find on the map of the United States—of rivers I never heard of.

Mr. DUNNELL. Does the gentleman refer to rivers for which an appropriation has been made?

Mr. ELLIS. They are named in the bill, and money poured out like water for their survey.

Mr. DUNNELL. Let me correct the gentleman for a moment. There is not a river or harbor in the bill that has not been surveyed by order of Congress by the Engineer Department of the Army, or for which a recommendation has not been made.

Mr. ELLIS. That may be. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars are appropriated for the survey of numerous creeks—for Otter Creek and a creek in Pennsylvania, a creek with an unpronounceable name.

Mr. DUNNELL. And in your State you have your full share of them.

Mr. ELLIS. No, sir; we asked nothing for creeks, but something we did not get for our great rivers. I am informed by my friend, the gentleman from Kentucky, in one of these streams for which appropriations are made you cannot float a saw-log except in rainy weather. [Laughter.]

Now, when we discuss these measures in Committee of the Whole, light is let in upon them.

Mr. REAGAN. If that is true, then I wish to say that the gentleman's colleague in asking for an appropriation for that creek committed an imposition upon us.

Mr. ELLIS. I am not here to defend the one or the other. Let the chairman of the Commerce Committee look to his own knowledge, for he is responsible. I now come to my part, the part I played before this committee in asking for an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at New Orleans and for Red River—

Mr. DUNNELL. I insist the gentleman from Louisiana should address the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana will address the Chair.

Mr. ELLIS. I will endeavor to speak so the Chair can hear me. I did appear before that committee. I appeared before it in behalf of two great objects: one was the harbor at New Orleans, and the other the great needs of Red River; two objects which in importance language can scarcely overestimate.

The harbor at New Orleans, for which your original bill provided not one dollar—

Mr. REAGAN. For which there were no estimates and for which no money was asked.

Mr. ELLIS. Yes; my colleague, General GINSON, appeared before your committee and asked for an appropriation.

Mr. REAGAN. Not till after the bill was reported and printed.

Mr. ELLIS. But you got the estimates of the engineer officers of the United States; and it was shown that the harbor of that city is being undermined; that a portion of the river is wearing into its banks threatening the very harbor itself; a harbor where rides the commerce of twenty States; the harbor of the second exporting city of this Government; a harbor whose commercial importance cannot be overrated. Yet with the estimates of the engineers asking you for $476,000, and with Licking River and the unmentionable river in Pennsylvania fully provided for, you dole out the miserable sum of $50,000. Is this statesmanship? Is this looking after the great interests of the whole country?

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman should not state what is not the fact. There is nothing for Licking River and nothing for what he calls the unmentionable river in Pennsylvania.

Mr. ELLIS. The gentleman forgets—

Mr. REAGAN. I do not forget. I state what is true.

Mr. ELLIS. Does the gentleman state that there is no item in the bill for Licking River?

Mr. REAGAN. There is an item for surveys of rivers and we did put into this bill the authority for surveys where members came before us with evidence which showed that the rivers or harbors in question ought to be surveyed.

Mr. ROBERTS. May I ask the gentleman from Louisiana to name the unmentionable river.

Mr. ELLIS. I will spell it, K-i-s-k-i-m-i-n-e-t-a-s. [Great laughter.]

Mr. REAGAN. Is there a dollar appropriated for that river? Or is it simply that a survey is ordered?

Mr. SPARKS. There is an order for a survey with a view to future appropriations.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman says he cannot pronounce these names. It is the Kis-k-i-min-e-tas River he stumbles at. [Laughter.] The honorable gentleman's education has been sadly neglected if he cannot pronounce that name. It is a musical Indian name, having a local association, and signifies, if I rightly remember, "sprightly stream." It is one of the tributaries of the Allegheny River. The survey of the Allegheny is provided for also. Of this stream, traversing the western extent of our State from Pittsburgh up into New York, I shall speak again. Steamboats have run up this stream from Pittsburgh to Olean in New York at different seasons of the year. It is one of the arteries of our wealth, if utilized. Twenty-seven miles above Pittsburgh the Kiskiminetas, so difficult for the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] to pronounce, empties into the Allegheny, being one of its main tributaries. The Kiskiminetas is formed by the junction of the Conemaugh and Loyalhanna at Saltsburgh, a town of considerable size some twenty-three miles above its mouth, and the Conemaugh, being called for a tribe of Indians of that name, has its source in the Allegheny Mountains. The Kiskiminetas and the Conemaugh form a continuous stream of some sixty miles east from the Allegheny River. If the gentleman will look at the report of the committee of the Senate of the United States, made in 1874, of which Mr. WINDOM, Senator from Minnesota, was chairman, on transportation routes to the seaboard, he will find these two rivers, Kiskiminetas and Conemaugh, mentioned and specially indicated by a distinguished engineer as links in the great chain of water communication between the Ohio and the Atlantic seaboard.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Is there a steamboat on those rivers?

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. There has been. I can bring evidence of a steamboat in former years when there was slack-water and canal navigation along these streams going up the Allegheny from Pittsburgh to the Kiskiminetas, thence up to Johnstown near the head of the Conemaugh.

Mr. SPARKS. A stern-wheel, was it not? [Laughter.]

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. It was not a steamer of the heaviest draught, but, sir, we want the examination by the Government to see how far artificial appliances can improve these streams for navigation and thus add to the wealth of the country.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to ask my colleague a question.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. What is the question?

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to know where that stream is; where is the stream that is called Conemaugh, Kiskiminetas, or some such name?

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Why, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, my colleague, aspires to be the chief executive of that State, and if he does not know the location of these streams he is ignorant of the geography of his State and ought not to seek such a high position.

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not fish in such shallow waters for the nomination of governor. If I had to go into the trout streams of Pennsylvania for it I would abandon it. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I am glad to have given the gentleman an opportunity of explaining. The people of Pennsylvania may agree with him in this respect and relieve him of his fishing.

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not know that these rivers have any existence.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I am surprised that my colleague, who claims some intelligence and to be the special friend of the working man and to know all about our industries, should declare before this House and the country that he does not know the location of the Kiskiminetas and Conemaugh Rivers. [Laughter.]

Mr. WRIGHT. It is a new name; I never heard of it before.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Whither are we drifting? The gentleman is an old democratic politician in Pennsylvania. He was famous when I was a child. He stood high in the councils of his party; so high that he presided, I believe, in 1844 over the national convention that nominated James K. Polk for President. Since then he has been in our State Legislature, member of Congress, chairman of democratic State committee, now candidate for governor, and yet does not know the location of these streams! The gentleman is older than he was, and his memory is possibly faithless to him. Let me give him a little history. Now, the gentleman cannot have forgotten the Pennsylvania Canal, the Pennsylvania public works, that the democratic party in our State controlled so long and manipulated so well to perpetuate their power. The Western Division ran from Pittsburgh to Johnstown, the western base of the Allegheny Mountains, thence over the mountains by the Portage Railroad to Hollidaysburgh, thence by the eastern base of the mountain, thence by canal to Harrisburgh, thence to Philadelphia, partly by canal and partly by rail; and when these were sold for $7,500,000 the gentleman's party, he along with them, doubtless groaned and complained in sadness. Now, sir, the western division of this canal from Pittsburgh to Johnstown was up along the Allegheny to Freeport, thence along the Kiskiminetas and Conemaugh Rivers. They were its only feeders, and along them were a number of dams built by the State and slackwater navigation over them a portion of the way. From some time in 1830 to 1850 all the travel and traffic from Philadelphia to Pittsburgh, from early spring to late fall, was over these streams and canal. In the statute-books of our State from the commencement of internal improvements in Pennsylvania until this moment are to be found the names Kiskiminetas and Conemaugh Rivers in connection with some public legislation. My friend does not know enough of geography to be our governor, I fear.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to know from my colleague if a survey is ordered in the bill for these two little streams.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. It is, and I am proud of my success on having obtained it.

Mr. WRIGHT. Are they navigable streams?

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. They can be a portion of the year, and it is practicable, in my opinion, and I have also the opinion of most distinguished engineers that they can be made navigable the greater portion, if not the whole, of the year. I want the survey to show this to the country for my part of the State.

Mr. WRIGHT. How wide are they?

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. At high water the gentleman could not swim across them; he would lose his wind before he got across.

Mr. BRIDGES. I wish to ask the gentleman whether at low water you cannot step across them.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. No, sir. There are ferries and fordings for horses at low water in some places across the streams. Only last week, on a trip home, missing the train and walking into Blairsville, some two miles, I had to pay a ferry-boat my ten cents to row me across the Conemaugh. This was nearly forty miles above the mouth of the Kiskiminetas. The gentleman is an old, old democrat, too. He has forgotten his geography. He does not know his own State. Let him come away from his anthracite-coal fields of Eastern Pennsylvania and visit the great diversities of resources in Western Pennsylvania, across the mountains. Come out and see our coal-fields, our coke-ovens, our fire-brick works, our lumber-yards, our mills, our agricultural wealth, our furnaces and rolling mills run by natural gas welling up from the bowels of the earth; our oil wells, making wealth to the State and the country. Come, travel a little and learn what your State needs.

Mr. ELLIS. That is the way they slipped in so easily, being so well oiled.

Mr. BRIDGES. I know they are little insignificant streams.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is an old man. I want to be respectful, but must say he does not know what he is talking about. I want it to go to the country that these gentlemen from the eastern part of our State who have spoken are against the improvement of our rivers, are against their examination and survey, are against giving us an opportunity of showing by scientific exploration that the Allegheny, the Kiskiminetas, the Conemaugh, can be made navigable at reasonable expense, and be of immense aid to our internal commerce.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] will proceed.

Mr. ELLIS. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania very kindly for his interruption, for it affords me a new argument in opposition to this bill.

We have seen a gray-headed gentleman who has lived in Pennsylvania more than forty years and occupied some of the highest positions in that State, and who is always right, who never heard of this river; and I was assured by the honorable Speaker that he did not know that there was such a river in the State.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated that he had never heard of this application for appropriation for this river, for he did not suppose the stream was navigable.

Mr. ELLIS. I stand corrected.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I am glad that the Chair has made that explanation, for his own sake.

Mr. ELLIS. Another gentleman from Pennsylvania, venerable in the public councils, contends that you can step over this river, and that it is not navigable at all. As I said before, the only way it crept into this appropriation bill was because it was oily.

Mr. KENNA. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ELLIS. Certainly.

Mr. KENNA. I desire to ask the gentleman what harm can be done, even taking his own view of the character of the remarkable stream spoken of, by an appropriation for surveys or examinations? If the streams are of the character spoken of no money will be spent upon them; not a single dollar. The engineers, if the streams are of the character described, would so report. The reports of the engineering department would show for the last ten, twenty, or thirty years that the Engineer Corps has never expended a dollar on the surveys of rivers of the character alluded to. I want to say further that the Committee on Commerce did not insert in this bill any provision for a survey which was not based upon a statement made to them by some gentleman upon this floor or other satisfactory information of the importance and magnitude of the streams and their navigability such as would make it worth a liberal appropriation and active efforts to improve them. When a gentleman comes before the committee and asks for a survey of a river which he states is navigable and of commercial importance, how in the name of God can any committee be protected from imposition, if the facts are not represented, except by an official and proper survey?

Mr. ELLIS. I must decline to yield further. I have but little more to say.

Mr. FRANKLIN. I rise to a point of order. I ask that the gentleman from Louisiana address the Chair.

Mr. ELLIS. I did not know that there was any rule in this House that forbade a member from speaking to those whose hearts and consciences and judgments he wished to reach. I know that the Speaker is the organ of the House, but it is not the Speaker alone whom I wish to address, but it is the brains and the great hearts of all the members of this House that I desire to reach. And when I talk to a man I like to talk directly at him, and not through a third party. I propose now to meet the assertions and to answer the question of the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. KENNA.] In the first place he says it was impossible for the committee to guard against mistakes and that they are not responsible for the appropriation inserted in the bill for this unpronounceable river. Ay, sir, there is a way and that is by bringing the bill under the rules and under the constitutional usage into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, so that we may bring the local geographical knowledge of members to bear upon these obscure points and it is only by close and searching investigation in the form of amendments and arguments when such a measure is before the House that such mistakes can be avoided.

Mr. FRANKLIN. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. ELLIS. I decline to yield. I desire now to answer the question of the gentleman from West Virginia. He tells us that not a dollar is asked in the bill for the survey of rivers.

Mr. Speaker, do you not know, with your great legislative experience, does not every member of this House know that a survey is the entering wedge to an appropriation? The first step is to get a survey, to get the estimate of the Engineer Corps, and then base upon that estimate an appropriation the next year.

Mr. KENNA. The gentleman misconceives my statement. I have not stated that no money is asked for these improvements for which surveys are made. I say that, if upon proper survey it is found that the improvement is necessary to the interests of commerce, then it is appropriated for, and I am willing to vote for the improvement. If, however, the engineer, upon examination, survey, or otherwise, ascertains facts about the character of the stream which show it to be unnecessary to proper commercial facilities, he so reports and no appropriation is made. The survey is simply the official means of information.

Mr. ELLIS. The injustice of the bill is what I object to. I appeared before the committee and asked for an appropriation for the Red River, the second river in length of navigable waters on the continent; the Red River that floats upon its bosom the commerce of $50,000,000; the Red River, the great artery of commerce for Western Arkansas, Indian Territory, and Western Louisiana; the Red River, which has twelve hundred miles of navigable waters and with two thousand miles of navigable waters tributary to it; the Red River, for which, upon the estimate of the Engineer Corps, $400,000 was asked, and which must be improved unless the Government desires that the mouth of the river shall be actually closed; the Red River, which is dammed and choked year by year; the Red River, into whose mazy depths have been sunk within the last ten years sixty steamboats worth $1,800,000, not including the value of the cargoes and of the precious lives that have been lost, for in one single instance two hundred and fifty souls went to the bottom because the steamboat was snagged; the Red River, which asked this appropriation, is doled out the miserable sum of $100,000.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman addresses me.

Mr. DUNNELL. The gentleman from Louisiana opposes the bill, because the committee did not comply with his request.

Mr. ELLIS. Not at all.

Mr. DUNNELL. Then you should take your name from the protest.

Mr. ELLIS. If you had hearkened to me, if you had mourned when I lamented, had danced when I piped, I would have taken the bill in its present shape and made the best of it.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman addresses me as if he supposed that I do not comprehend the character of that river, the extent of its commerce, and the dangers of its navigation. Every member of the Committee on Commerce will bear me witness that long before the gentleman himself appeared before the Committee I urged that liberal appropriation be made for that river.

Mr. ELLIS. I am not putting the gentleman on his defense to-day; he must explain his course otherwise than here.

Mr. FRANKLIN. The gentleman said he would yield to me for a question.

Mr. ELLIS. I will do so.

Mr. FRANKLIN. The gentleman has signed this protest against the action of a majority of this House, and I desire to ask him a few questions. The confusion in this Hall has been so great that I could not hear all that he has said, but from what I could gather of the gentleman's remarks, one of his objections to this bill is that it was not allowed to be discussed in Committee of the Whole. Another objection was that it contains appropriations for some streams which he considers of not sufficient importance to have appropriations made for them. Now the questions which I desire to ask him are these: was he not a member of the Forty-fourth Congress, and did he not vote for a river and harbor bill which passed under a suspension of the rules, without reference to the Committee of the Whole; and did he utter any protest then? Again I ask him if the river and harbor bill that passed in the Forty-fourth Congress did not contain appropriations for streams just as insignificant as are these? And I ask him if he had obtained a million of dollars as he desired from this committee for his river would he not have voted for this bill?

Mr. ELLIS. The gentleman is barking on a cold trail; the same question has already been asked me and I have answered it.

In conclusion I desire to say that it is not the size of this bill that I grumble at. I do not believe the American people are a mean people; I do not believe they are stingy or narrow-minded. I believe that in the broad field of statesmanship there are prouder titles to be won than the very questionable one of watch-dog of the Treasury. I do not believe that statesmanship consists in meanness.

I believe the American Congress should endeavor to meet the wishes and aspirations of the people, to respond to the spirit of progress that is all abroad in the land. I will vote for ten, twelve, fifteen millions of dollars to employ idle hands and to develop the hidden resources of this country. I would do that willingly provided the appropriations be just and wise and in accordance with the true object of legislation.

Mr. FRANKLIN. I ask that the gentleman answer my question.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I desire to ask a question of the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. COX, of New York. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.]

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Will the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] allow me to ask him a question? Can he set a limit to the power of Louisiana to swallow up the public money?

Mr. SPRINGER. I cannot yield.

Mr. KENNA. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KENNA. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Cox] having risen to a question of privilege, and the point of order having been raised that the protest read here is not proper as a part of his remarks, I ask how the gentleman now undertakes to control the floor?

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognized the gentleman from New York as entitled to the floor for an hour. The gentleman yielded to the gentleman from Texas, and it was understood that the time occupied by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] should not come out of the hour of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I desire to ask another question. Under this new rule of passing a bill and debating it afterward, is there any limit to the debate? In saying this I do not mean to be understood as favoring the bill which passed on yesterday, for I do not; but, sir, I wish to bring this unprofitable debate to a close, and to enter my objection to the new rule adopted this morning.

Mr. SPRINGER. I believe I am entitled to the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Cox] is entitled to ten minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. COX, of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope this question, so far as it relates to the right of presenting a protest against the action of the majority of the House, will be decided, not with any reference to the bill which was passed yesterday, but in view of the precedents that we may establish by such decision. There are some questions about which, or concerning which, the only remedy that members upon this floor can have is to present a protest in respectful language, and have it entered on the Journal. There are certain rights which members have under the Constitution; certain things which the Constitution prescribes with regard to legislation. When any of these things are disregarded by a majority of the House, it is the right of the minority to present and have entered upon the Journal their protest in respectful language against such action.

For instance, in article 1, section 5, of the Constitution, it is provided:

Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner, and under such penalties, as each House may provide.

Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member.

Each House shall keep a Journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such parts as may in their judgment require secrecy, and the yeas and nays of the members of either House on any question shall, at the desire of one-fifth of those present, be entered on the Journal.

Now, Mr. Speaker, suppose that upon the passage of a bill coming before this House one-fifth of the members present should demand that the yeas and nays be taken and the majority should refuse to let the yeas and nays be entered on the Journal, that would be a case in which the constitutional rights of the minority would entitle them to have the facts spread upon the record; and for the majority to deprive them of that right would be in utter disregard of the constitutional rights of the minority.

Suppose the House should undertake, by a majority vote, to expel a member. Would it not be a constitutional right of the minority to protest on the Journal against such action?

Now, whenever members deem a bill that is passed to be in violation of the terms of the Constitution, they have a right, and it is their only remedy, to place upon record their respectful dissent from such action. And especially is this the case when such bill was passed under a suspension of the rules, which admits of no discussion, and but one reading, and that from the Clerk's desk.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. Cox] has cited the precedents from the parliamentary authorities. I will not consume time by repeating them. But it has been said that it would be dangerous to establish such a precedent; that members would be constantly protesting and burdening the Journal with their grievances. This will not follow. It is presumed that members of Congress will not abuse a high privilege of this kind. In many of the States there are provisions in the State constitutions securing the right of protest to two or more members of the Legislature in all cases where they may deem their rights abridged in any manner. Such privileges have never been abused, so far as I have ever known.

I respectfully suggest, then, that the spreading of this protest upon the Journal can do harm to no one. It is an important principle of parliamentary right, which any member of the House may at any time feel it his privilege to exercise, to have his respectful protest entered on the Journal. I ask the House to reflect seriously before a precedent is set which would deny this right to the humblest member of this body. We cannot tell whose turn it may next be to ask the privilege of entering a protest in this way. Let us decide this question without any reference to the bill upon which it now arises and with a view solely to the individual rights of members on this floor—rights which they cannot surrender without being derelict in their duty.

Mr. HARTZELL. Will my colleague allow me to ask him whether voting against a bill is not a respectful protest against the passage of the measure?

Mr. SPRINGER. That would be a silent protest. But a member's constituents could not understand why he had voted against a bill, which had many good provisions, but which he could not vote for on account of obnoxious provisions which he could not point out or expose. Further, this right of protest might be invoked when the yeas and nays were not called, although under the Constitution one-fifth of the members might demand to have the yeas and nays entered upon the record.

Mr. HARTZELL. Did you not have the yeas and nays on the passage of this bill?

Mr. SPRINGER. On this bill the yeas and nays were recorded. I am not speaking about that. My colleague's district has the Mississippi River on the one side and the Ohio River on the other. It is perfectly right that he should favor a liberal appropriation for those rivers. I do not object to that. But the next bill that comes up may not suit my colleague or the distinguished gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.] It may not suit the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. REA:] and each of these gentlemen may then desire to have their respectful protests entered on the record.

Mr. HARTZELL. Perhaps the appropriation for the improvement of the Illinois River was not satisfactory to my colleagues.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will answer my colleague. I have no fault to find with the bill on account of the amount appropriated for the Illinois River which washes my district on the west line for seventy-five miles. The Committee on Commerce have acted liberally by my district; and in my action on this bill I am not influenced one way or the other on account of the appropriation for the Illinois River.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COX, of New York. I yield five minutes to my colleague, [Mr. HEWITT, of New York.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has but five minutes, and the Chair understood him to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. HOOKER.]

Mr. COX, of New York. If my time can be extended I would be glad to yield to others all the time that may be given to me. If there be no objection, I hope time will be extended to these gentlemen.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks that his time be extended five minutes.

Several members objected.

Mr. COX, of New York. Then I yield all the time I have remaining to my colleague.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be an impression that the protest to which some members (myself among them) have affixed their names is directed against the merits of the bill. That is not my case. I have had no chance to study the details of this bill; I do not know what it contains. The bill as it has passed this House is, I am informed, not in the shape in which it was printed.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I decline to be interrupted. I have had no chance to study the details of this bill; but I find that it appropriates the sum of $7,000,000. This is the amount which it takes from the Treasury without discussion by a process of combination which is apparent upon the face of it. Now it is not against the bill, which may be right or may be wrong, but against the passage of it, right or wrong, without an opportunity to discuss its provisions in detail in the Committee of the Whole, according to the wise and well-settled rules of the House that we protest. These rules were made to protect the Treasury. The suspension of them leaves its doors unguarded and at the mercy of jobbers.

I have heard gentlemen denounced here because, having gone before the committee to present respectful applications for proper works, they have still thought fit to vote against the bill and protest against its passage. This seems to me most improper and unjust. For one I can say that the city of New York has no grievance in this matter. I find on looking over the bill that $753,000 have been appropriated to works in the vicinity of the city of New York. It is the largest appropriation made for any locality in the bill. The district which I represent is more largely interested in these works than any district in this House. Yet I voted against the bill, not because my district is not fully cared for, but because I will never consent to any legislation which deprives this House of the opportunity of full and free discussion and denies to the people of the country the means of knowing how they are taxed, why they are taxed, and what is done with the proceeds of taxation. It is for this reason I protest, and I should blush to avail myself of the excuse that my district is taken care of, and that therefore I should even tacitly assent to a kind of legislation which violates the fundamental principles of responsible government.

I do not know whether the protest comes strictly within the rules or not; I am inclined to think it does not; but I say there are occasions when precedents are made which are so dangerous that it becomes every man to do what he can to stop the progress of legislation which tends to take out of the Treasury—I will not say to spoliolate and rob it, but which tends to take out of the Treasury the hard earnings of the people without securing an adequate return for the expenditure. Hence I protest; and if the city of New York never gets another dollar for these public works which concern the country at large far more than they do her, I shall still, so long as I have a seat on this floor, vote and protest against legislation which appropriates large sums of money without being subjected to the crucible of discussion in this House. If it is right it need not fear discussion; if it is wrong it should never be enacted without it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] is recognized.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, I think we can get along without any more of this discussion, and it is time to call the previous question.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask the gentleman from Maine to yield to me for ten minutes.

Mr. ELAM. I hope the gentleman will give me a few minutes. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. WRIGHT. My name is not upon the protest, but I want to give my reasons for voting against the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine asks the previous question.

Mr. REILLY. I rise to a parliamentary question. Upon what does the gentleman demand the previous question?

The SPEAKER. He raises the question of order as to this being a question of privilege.

Mr. REILLY. Has the Chair passed upon that?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not.

Mr. REILLY. Would not that be the first thing in order?

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask my friend from Maine to withdraw the call for the previous question for ten minutes. But has the gentleman from Maine any right to demand the previous question?

The SPEAKER. The previous question would terminate debate if sustained, and that of course would bring the Chair to decide, so far as he saw fit, the question or to say whatever he may have to say on the subject of its being a question of privilege.

Mr. HALE. Have I an hour if I choose to occupy it? Not that I mean to do it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized, and has a right to an hour if he chooses to occupy that time.

Mr. HALE. Very well; then I withdraw the previous question for the present. I will yield to the gentleman from Maryland five minutes.

Mr. WRIGHT. How much time has the gentleman got?

The SPEAKER. An hour.

Mr. WRIGHT. Will the gentleman give me a little time? I believe that he consents to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland has the floor for five minutes.

Mr. ROBERTS. I desire to have order before proceeding.

Mr. WRIGHT. Have I the floor or not?

The SPEAKER. No, the gentleman from Maine has the floor for an hour, and he has yielded five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. WRIGHT. Then after the gentleman from Maryland has concluded I shall ask to be heard, and I hope the gentleman from Maine will yield to me.

Mr. ROBERTS. After the very thorough discussion we have had on this subject I do not wish to intrude any extended remarks of mine on the House, but I simply desire to make a personal remark with respect to my connection with this river and harbor bill, and that is this: although I am a member of the Committee on Commerce, and although I presume I have perhaps as large a water front in my district as in most of the districts provided for in the bill, yet I have not asked an appropriation of a single dollar for my district. [Here Mr. ROBERTS was interrupted by a colloquy upon the floor and by shouts of laughter, which were long-continued.] Mr. Speaker, if the House is not in a fit condition to draw a reasonable and very proper distinction it is no fault of mine. I have only that remark to make in this connection.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to resume, I repeat that I have not in connection with the discharge of my duties on the Committee on Commerce thought proper to ask a single dollar for the district which I represent. I admit that I did not vote for the last river and harbor appropriation bill, for the reason that I had grave doubts as to whether it was right and proper, and because of those doubts declined to give it my support.

But, sir, I have had ample and satisfactory means of information as to the contents of the bill just passed, and I know further that I have sought by every effort in my power to prevent any wrong getting into this bill in any shape or form, and I think my colleagues on the committee will bear me out in saying that I have always sought to prevent the Government being used for improper purposes by appropriating money to hunt up streams not to be found on the map of the country.

But there is this to be said in connection with the vote on this bill: there are certain gentlemen who have to-day manifested great concern lest legislation may be taking a very improper course. I think if the river and harbor appropriation bill had provided certain sums of money for them there would have been a much larger vote than is at present recorded in favor of the bill. And in so far as my friend from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] is concerned I think I may say with justice to him as well as to myself that I earnestly sought to obtain for him all he desired, and he generously said that in the event of obtaining it he would give to the bill his earnest support. Not, however, receiving so much as he expected, but in lieu thereof only the sum of $50,000, I find he is among the immaculates who are not willing to give their assent to the bill and must needs place upon record a protest against so great a wrong. I desire to send to the Clerk's desk my protest, which will explain the position occupied in the past by some of our protesting friends, and as part of it I ask the Clerk to read the second allegation in the protest and then the names which I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

2. All our rules, and especially Rule 121, specially applicable to appropriations for works of internal improvement, are intended to guard against a vote in gross on such appropriations, and require, for wise purposes, separate votes on each item, under certain conditions. We protest against the infraction of so salutary a rule on a bill where the tendency is to combine for general spoliation upon the Treasury.

Mr. ROBERTS. Let the names be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WILLIAM P. CALDWELL.
MILTON S. ROBINSON.
ANDREW H. HAMILTON.
MILTON A. CANDLER.
E. JOHN ELLIS.

Mr. ROBERTS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk to have read that which I have marked on page 2359 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Forty-fourth Congress.

The Clerk read as follows:

On the passage of House bill No. 3922 making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works of rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. ROBERTS. Now read the names of those I have marked who voted in the affirmative on the passage of the bill, which was on the motion of Mr. HERFORD to suspend the rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

William P. Caldwell, Candler, Ellis, Andrew H. Hamilton, Robinson.

Mr. ROBERTS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I protest that in view of these facts the paper presented by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] as a characterization of the conduct of the Committee on Commerce and of those who have voted for this bill, is, to say the least of it, unwarrantable and improper.

Mr. WRIGHT, Mr. HAMILTON, and Mr. TURNER rose.

Mr. HAMILTON. I ask the gentleman from Maine to yield five minutes to me. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. TURNER. I ask the gentleman to yield me one minute for a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WRIGHT.]

Mr. WRIGHT. I should have preferred it if the gentleman had given me ten minutes, but must make the most of the time he generously assigns me.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take in this House a factious position. I do not want to throw any obstacle in the way of just and proper legislation. I voted against the passage of the bill, but refused to add my name to the protest. I think, however, it was no more than right that those of us who voted against the bill, if we did it in a proper and conscientious manner, should have the opportunity of stating the reasons why we voted against it.

Now, as far as regards the appropriation for rivers and harbors, if all these purposes were right and proper, I should not hesitate to vote for an appropriation of twenty or thirty millions of dollars. I believe it is a better way to expend the public money for proper and useful purposes in this hour of general calamity by giving laboring-men an opportunity of finding employment than to do almost any other thing. But what I protest against, and what I think must strike the judgment of the House with force and power, is that there are appropriations in this bill that ought never to have been introduced. I notice there are seventy-eight new items introduced into this bill where money is appropriated for the purpose of commencing new enterprises. Perhaps a large majority of these will terminate upon an examination. It will be seen that any outlay upon them would be a useless expenditure of money and they will be dropped. But why put them in at all?

Now, I do not want to say anything in opposition to the views of my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] as to the appropriation for surveys of the two small streams on the Allegheny Mountains; but he knows and every one who is acquainted with the geography of Pennsylvania knows the fact that no good can result from an expenditure of money for the exploration and survey of streams of this kind. Two small streams, the Kiskiminetas and Conemaugh, that are not sufficiently large in dry weather to turn an ordinary grist-mill, are not the subjects that ought to be introduced into general appropriation bills under the name of improvements of rivers and harbors. They are small creeks and cannot be made navigable for steamers. Why waste the money in the Treasury for such a purpose? Is it proper and just to do so? Is this wise legislation?

So far as regards the development of the Mississippi in making navigable "the great Father of Waters," I would appropriate millions without any hesitation at all. As regards the erection of fortifications and defenses for the protection of the country, I would not give my assent to do any act that would cut short what is necessary to put our harbors in a perfect state of repair to meet all emergencies. This is a national duty; it enters into the question of national safety and defense. What legislators would hesitate to appropriate money for this purpose? It would not only be remiss, but the act of bad faith to do so.

But what I want to bring to the attention, the judgment, and the reason of the House, if the House has its reason—and I begin to think from the last five or six hours' experience the House has lost its reason—what I want to bring to the attention of the House is that to these great measures of public necessities of making your great rivers navigable and putting your harbors in a state of perfect repair you should give and give liberally; but do not under this system of logging, plainly shown in this bill by granting money for surveys of inconsiderable streams that can amount to nothing with the expenditure of any sum and will only serve as an example in the future for wasteful expenditures of the public money. I know that the good sense of the House, if it can be brought to think of it as it ought, will take this view of the case. I am far from opposing any useful appropriation of money for the improvements of the rivers in Pennsylvania. I am not influenced by any other than sound judgment. Where money can be used properly for this purpose I will hold up both hands for it. Where it cannot be done I will oppose the waste of public money as well in my own State as any others.

This bill draws from the Treasury over seven millions, and that money, or at least half of it, can be appropriated to much better purposes. There are ways enough in which this can be done. There are none within the sound of my voice but can understand this.

I would have voted for the bill if there had not been introduced into it all these new subjects. But for these I should have given it a hearty support, and I only regret it was not in my power to do it. And I think we, the minority, must not be condemned for not voting for the bill, because there are measures in it which ought not to have received the attention of the committee nor the countenance of Congress. Strike them out, and this opposition to the bill will cease. We are not fighting against making a perfect navigation of the Mississippi and its great tributaries. We are not fighting against putting the seaboard and the lakes in a perfect state of defense. We would grant all the money that is necessarily required for these purposes. We are not fighting against such a line of policy, but we are fighting against a combination bringing new measures, which never can be of the least benefit to the public and because every dollar thus granted is absolutely thrown away. The public moneys should not be squandered by millions under such slender prettexts. There are famishing men to whom it would be more wise and provident to bestow it upon.

Mr. WRIGHT. Has my time expired?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time is out.

Mr. YOUNG. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. HALE. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Maine yield for the motion to adjourn?

Mr. HALE. Not at present.

Mr. YOUNG. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I am obliged to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] for his courtesy.

Mr. HALE. There is a general idea that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] will finish the speech his colleague [Mr. WRIGHT] was not able to finish. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. That is my intention, but not in the way my colleague would have finished. I shall pursue a different vein of thought. I again thank the gentleman from Maine for the courtesy of the floor for a brief period.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased my colleague [Mr. WRIGHT] made the apologetic speech he has just closed. Something of that kind was necessary after his utterances of a few moments ago. When we started on this discussion he was unable to pronounce the euphonious word Kiskiminetas. He has been instructed by the few minutes' discourse we have had. He now rapidly pronounces that musical word smoothly and sweetly. A little more debate about our rivers and the necessities and requests of Western Pennsylvania, and the geography of my colleague from the Wilkesbarre district will improve as rapidly as his pronunciation.

Now, sir, a few words about the policy of this bill. There may be some of its details objectionable and obnoxious to the severest criticism. The amount appropriated is large, not too large, I trust, to embarrass the Treasury of the country. It will be drawn out gradually and will be distributed like the dews of heaven upon all sections of the country. I have no time to dwell in detail; if so, I could indicate various objections. But, sir, this measure is in the interest of public improvement—to make available for an internal commerce, at a time when labor is cheap and seeking some employment, the avenues for commercial intercourse constructed with such liberal hand by the Author of our being in different parts of the country.

A few years ago we did not have bills like this so general in their character. The earlier history of the country does not give us general river and harbor appropriation bills. But, sir, the policy of Government aid in internal improvements in the development of our resources has obtained in the country for many years, and has obtained after a long struggle among the earlier statesmen. I am too young to have known Henry Clay, but I was brought up in that old whig school of politics of which he was so conspicuous an exponent; which invited the fostering, powerful hand of the Federal Government in promoting commerce among the States and with foreign nations by making more navigable our rivers, and more safe our harbors. This attractive man, a liberal statesman, as early as 1824, in discussing "a bill authorizing the President to cause certain surveys and estimates to be made on the subject of roads and canals," said:

It is said that the power to regulate commerce merely authorizes the laying of imposts and duties. But Congress has no power to lay imposts and duties on the trade among the several States. The grant must mean, therefore, something else. What is it? The power to regulate commerce among the several States, if it has any meaning, implies authority to foster it, to promote it, to bestow upon it facilities similar to those which have been conceded to our foreign trade. All the powers of this Government should be interpreted in reference to its first, its best, its greatest object—the Union of the States. And is not that Union best invigorated by an intimate social and commercial connection between all parts of the confederacy?

The subsequent practices of the Government have sanctioned this policy. But, sir, I have no time for extended remarks. There can now be no doubt of the clear constitutional power of Congress to make general appropriations for the improvement of the navigation of the rivers of the country to make them convenient avenues for the trade of the people.

It is to be found in that eighth section of first article of the Constitution giving Congress "power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States." In a noted case, Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheaton, 196, Chief-Justice Marshall says:

This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution.

And if any doubt this there is ample authority to declare that the power to regulate commerce among the several States does not stop at State lines, but may be exercised within the territorial jurisdiction of a State. Says Justice Johnson in the same case:

The power of Congress does not stop at the jurisdictional lines of the several States. It would be a very useless power if it could not pass those lines. The commerce of the United States with foreign nations is that of the whole United States. Every district has a right to participate. The deep streams which penetrate our country in every direction pass through the interior of almost every State of the Union, and furnish the means of exercising that right. If it exists within the States then the power of Congress may be exercised within a State.

So, then, sir, there is ample authority in the practices of the Government and in the direct utterances of the highest Federal court of the power of Congress to make the appropriations of the character contemplated in this bill. It is wise at a time like this to do so. Sir, labor is at a standstill in many parts of the country. He is a public benefactor who invents some useful employment for the idle thousands.

It is said we are approaching hard-pan in the business of the country, indeed have arrived there; if so, let us now take a new departure on the hard-pan principle. Hard-pan prices have been reached; let the Government, then, at these low rates profit as well as the private citizen. Let the nation seize this opportunity to do so much good for itself and its idle subjects. Such, then, being a wise policy, why hesitate? Why find fault? The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WRIGHT] pauses at the threshold and complains at the appropriations for the survey of the Allegheny, of the Kiskiminetas and Conemaugh in Western Pennsylvania. Why this? I have before, a few moments since, spoken of this. Let the distinct issue be made with him and others who object, right here on the record. Why shall Government aid be not given to improve the navigation of the Allegheny if it is practicable to do so?

It is a stream, not merely local in its character, rising in New York. By steamboat navigation it has long since borne commodities from Olean, from Jamestown, and other points in that State to the Ohio and Mississippi. The Allegheny and Monongahela, uniting at Pittsburgh, form the Ohio. Much of the lumber trade to Pittsburgh comes down the Allegheny. Why, sir, steamboat navigation has existed on this stream from Pittsburgh up to Olean. Steamboats have run more than six months in the year more than a hundred miles up. At this very time, as I was informed a few days since, some of the manufacturers and steamboat-owners at Pittsburgh and vicinity are raising a fund among themselves—a few thousand dollars—to dredge out the channel at what is called Garrison's Island and Six Mile Island, above Pittsburgh, which, when done, will give a clear channel and steamboat navigation to the mouth of the Kiskiminetas, twenty-seven miles above Pittsburgh. There are manufactories at Freeport, opposite, giving a market for staves which come up the Ohio from West Virginia to Pittsburgh.

There are some two hundred thousand of these in barges lying at Pittsburgh in the Allegheny, waiting the rising of the water to go up the river to a market. A few thousand dollars judiciously expended in dredging, and possibly in the erection of a few dams, would make this stream navigable all seasons of the year. Then, sir, it penetrates the great oil region. With this river navigable to that point for barges and heavy freights it would relieve the great question to some extent of the discrimination in freights which is now so much tormenting the trade of that region of country. Sir, the improvement of this stream helps the commerce of the nation. It is a feeder of the Ohio, the Ohio of the Mississippi, and thence to the ocean. With the improvement of the Allegheny, with such aid as will make it navigable at all seasons of the year, the improvement of the Kiskiminetas and Conemaugh will follow as tributaries to the trade of the Allegheny and Ohio.

Why, sir, I hold in my hand now an official document with maps and charts. It is the report of the Senate Committee (of 1874) on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, a Senate document. The purpose of this committee was to discover and report upon such water routes of transportation between the States and to the ocean as were cheap and practicable. I find these very rivers, Kiskiminetas and Conemaugh mentioned favorably as links in the chain from the Ohio to Delaware Bay. Hear a moment from a distinguished engineer cited in this report, page 96. The subject of great water communication seems yet to have inspired no very active interest in Pennsylvania, yet I question whether there is a State in the Union which has better claims for notice in that particular at the hands of the General Government. After explaining the question he says:

The seaboard may be reached from the Ohio by three different routes commencing at Pittsburgh. The first ascends the Allegheny River to the mouth of the Kiskiminetas, and thence by the Conemaugh reaches the Allegheny Mountains, through which a tunnel would connect the eastern and western waters, and the Valley of the Juniata would be used to reach the Susquehanna and thence the sea at our new seaport on Delaware Bay, a distance of something over four hundred miles, say four hundred and twenty-five. A canal has existed on this whole line except through the summit of the mountain, which was overcome by a portage railway.

This route was spoken of favorably by the Senate committee. This engineer, who is more familiar with our State than my colleague, is Colonel James Worrall, who is in full life and activity. It was wise then in this bill to provide for the survey of these streams and call for an estimate from scientific engineers of the expense of their utilization for constant navigation. I have no time to dwell.

Mr. SOUTHWARD. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I cannot yield now. I have been induced to these remarks because of my colleague's characterizing these rivers inconsiderable streams.

Mr. WRIGHT. Do you say they are not?

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I say they are not. I say that they are important and can be made valuable for internal commerce.

Mr. WRIGHT. How large?

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I refer the gentleman to the report of distinguished engineers which I have in my hand, from which it appears that these streams are twice the width of this Capitol. I have the map here. If he will look he can see for himself.

Mr. WRIGHT. How large are they?

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Not less than three hundred feet across.

Mr. HALE. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TURNER.]

Mr. TURNER. It was at my instance that the survey of the Licking River was placed in this bill. It has been stated that it is not a stream of any consideration. As far back as 1835 it was surveyed by order of the Kentucky Legislature by distinguished engineers and a report was made to the Legislature that it was navigable two hundred and fifty miles, slack-water navigation, opening up one of the richest fields for coal and iron and other resources.

Mr. HALE. I now yield for five minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. KENNA.]

Mr. KENNA. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire whatever to detain the House. I realize the condition of its sentiment in regard to this matter, but I regard it as a duty to the Committee on Commerce, who prepared and reported the bill under discussion, and to the members of this House who cast their votes for it, that I should say a word or two upon its merits.

I shall not partake of the spirit which has characterized the discussion which has been going on. My object is to say a few things about the manner in which the bill passed by the House was prepared by the Committee on Commerce. In the first place I want to repudiate the idea on my own behalf and on behalf of all the members of the committee that any log-rolling was indulged in or was necessary to secure the passage of this bill. The evidence has been ample here that if a resort to that system had been necessary the strength of this bill could have been increased to a very great extent. There is no item in the bill for which one single dollar was appropriated which has not been thoroughly examined, surveyed and reported upon favorably by the engineers of the Government and which the committee, upon full examination of the recommendations of the Engineer Corps and of every other available means of information, did not believe would be important in its relation to the commercial facilities of the country. I can vouch personally for this much. And let me say in this connection that the principal hostility which has been displayed both toward this bill and toward the gentlemen who have supported it, has not come from the fact that the bill takes $7,000,000 out of the Treasury, but from the fact that it fails to contain appropriations which the committee could not consistently and properly put in the bill, and which were asked for by members.

Mr. COX, of New York. That does not apply to me?

Mr. MAISH. Nor to me.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. COX, of New York. I desire to make a point of order upon the remark of the gentleman.

Mr. KENNA. If gentlemen will let me proceed they will see that there is nothing in my statement, if adhered to strictly, that reflects upon any gentleman. I did not intend, and upon an examination of my language the idea cannot be maintained, that it is susceptible of such a construction as possibly to be an implication upon any gentleman. I do not accuse any gentleman on this floor of improper motive or action on this matter. But I do say and I mean what I say, and I stand by it, that there have been votes cast by gentlemen on this floor in opposition to this bill because of the fact that their propositions were not favorably entertained by the committee.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Name those men.

Mr. BEEBE. If the gentleman will not name the men, then, as one who voted against this bill and refused two years ago to support such a bill, I say that his statement does not apply to me.

Mr. KENNA. The gentleman's explanation is wholly unnecessary.

Mr. STENGER. I disclaim for myself.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. And I also.

Mr. McMAHON. I signed that paper, and I do not think I was before the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CLYMER. And I ask the gentleman to except me.

Mr. KENNA. If gentlemen insist upon imputing to me the idea of charging improper motives or conduct upon them in this matter, then it may be necessary for me to make myself better understood. But I have not intended to do any such thing and I have not done it. I have not used a word that indicates that any gentleman has been prompted in this matter by improper motives.

Mr. STENGER. Does the gentleman think it would not be improper to cast a vote against this bill simply because a man's district has not been recognized in it?

Mr. KENNA. That is just where the gentleman misunderstands me. I do not say that it was improper for any gentleman to cast any vote. I have not said that it was improper for any gentleman on this floor to vote according to his judgment either for or against this bill.

Mr. REILLY. Did not the gentleman say in language as plain as he could use that if more money had been in the bill it would have received more votes?

Mr. KENNA. I did say that, and I stand by it.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri, and others. Give the names.

Mr. KENNA. I decline to be further interrupted or forced into a personal assault upon any member.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KENNA. I have been interrupted and I ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] to yield to me a little farther.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. There is already one question of personal privilege pending.

Mr. KENNA. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] insists upon a privileged question, when he is not included in the remarks. He was not before the committee.

Mr. BLACKBURN. When I can be recognized I desire to rise to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. CARLISLE. I ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] to yield to me for a few minutes.

Many MEMBERS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. HALE. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] a few minutes further.

Mr. KENNA. I hope there may be order so that I can proceed without further annoyance. [After a pause.] I have stated clearly what I intended, and I want to be distinctly understood upon that proposition; I do not mean to be forced into personalities here, nor, if I know myself, do I intend to be forced out of the position I occupy into a false one.

I have repeatedly stated, and in order that it may be well understood, I will state it again, that applications were made to the Committee on Commerce, arguments were made before the committee for increase of appropriations already contained in the bill that was passed, and for additional appropriations not contained in it which were rejected. All of them I have no doubt were made in good faith. They were urged upon the committee, and passed upon after a fair, thorough, and laborious investigation of the merits of each and every item, which involved the reading, in open and full committee, during the three months devoted exclusively to this work, over fifteen hundred pages of reports and estimates of the engineers of the Army. Some of those items were rejected, and in other cases the committee refused to increase the amounts which had been allowed. The failure of the bill last year made larger appropriations this year absolutely necessary. Works in many instances were left in a half-completed condition. They were impaired by neglect, injured by time and storm, and hence a bill reported now, which practically covers two years, is necessarily large.

I know that in some instances dissatisfaction was created by the action of the committee. Some of the gentlemen thought the rights and needs of their section had not been recognized according to their merits. They were not content and acted accordingly. That is the extent to which I go, as far as I want to go or mean to go, and I cannot conceive that the statement can be contorted into a reflection upon any gentleman upon this floor.

One word further in regard to these surveys. I was chairman of the subcommittee appointed to consider and report upon them. I thought, and I confess that nothing has occurred to divest me of that confidence, that when a member on this floor stated to that subcommittee the facts upon which his application for a particular survey was based, the subcommittee had a right to believe those facts to be true and to act accordingly. I say now to you, Mr. Speaker, and to this House, that I have seen nothing to divest me of that opinion.

The bill provides for examinations or surveys as the case may be. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars is the aggregate sum appropriated for all the surveys authorized by the bill. Of that sum not one dollar is designated for any particular stream. The whole question of the propriety of surveying any stream is therefore left practically with the engineers, who of all men on earth ought to know their business. Moreover, if any stream named in the bill is of the character which has been so recklessly asserted here, the engineers without expense or cost will report that it is inexpedient to undertake its improvement.

I felt called upon to say this much in view of what has occurred in this House, and particularly in view of the very reckless and thoughtless declarations which have been made by members here and by the press throughout the country, declarations calculated to create the impression upon persons ignorant of the subject that the members of this House had combined together as a band of highway robbers for no other purpose on earth than to secure such a bill as would control a majority in its favor. God knows, sir, that no committee of the House has striven more assiduously to perform its labors honorably and fairly than the Committee on Commerce has done. As one of its members, I feel authorized to make a remark applicable to all who constitute that committee. I do so upon my personal knowledge of the facts. I do not believe that section or State or politics or any consideration has actuated them, save an honest desire to do their duty. The faithful performance of that duty has been abundantly vindicated by the action of this House.

If the bill does not happen to meet the approval of twenty or thirty gentlemen representing a minority on this floor, the majority of this body, representing nearly two hundred, ought no doubt to be very sorry for it. So far as I am concerned I have endeavored to do my part fairly and faithfully; and I believe that every other member of the committee has done likewise. I believe that the overwhelming majority which passed this bill has been prompted by the same spirit. [Here the hammer fell.] One moment more. I wish to add that of all the times in the history of this Government there never was a period when public work could be done so cheaply as now. The advantages to be derived from the increase of our commercial facilities will compensate tenfold for every dollar expended. The bill contains a provision authorizing the carrying on of the work by hired labor, and I desire to remind gentlemen here that it is the only bill passed or to be passed by this Congress in the present distressed and ruined condition of the country which appropriates a farthing that will reach the hands of actual labor. Under the provisions of this bill, while the Government realizes full value received for all it expends, every dollar of it will go to the relief of the unemployed millions in the land.

Mr. CARLISLE. I now ask the gentleman from Maine to yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. HALE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. ELAM.]

Mr. ELAM. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Maine; but as I am allowed so brief a time, and as the House is evidently so desirous to come to a vote, I will not occupy time with any remarks.

Mr. HALE. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HAMILTON.]

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, because we allow a leech to suck a few drops of blood from our arms, are we to let that leech remain there until the last life-drop is gone? Because in the Forty-fourth Congress some of us saw fit to vote to give for these small streams the appropriations then asked, are members from those localities to come here in the Forty-fifth Congress and demand more? Is there no generosity in the world? Has it fled from the earth? Are we always to continue to give because we have once given? Is this iniquitous legislation to continue? It was iniquitous legislation in the Forty-fourth Congress to attempt to pass the bill under a suspension of the rules. I do not propose to plead the "baby act" by any manner of means. But it was my first session in Congress; and I did believe then that committees might come with bills when it was a unanimous report which it would be safe to put through under a suspension of the rules. But, sir, I find I was woefully mistaken. I now know that committees may report unanimously bills which we never ought to pass. At that time I had no opportunity of studying the bill. I did look over such provisions as affected parts of the country I knew something about; and I presumed that the bill was right because a proper sum was allowed to those portions of the country. I had no opportunity at that time to examine the bill; and I took it upon the faith of the committee.

The vote I gave in the Forty-fourth Congress I regret. I never would do it again. The vote I gave on this bill in this House I give cheerfully, and I put my name to the protest willingly, and especially because I have found that important bills appropriating money should be carefully considered in the House and not taken on the report of a committee simply. I will never take another bill simply on the report of any committee—never! never! never! [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HALE. I now yield to the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say that he thinks he could of his own volition bring this debate to a close; but as one side of the House has had one hour, he was willing that a like amount of time should be occupied by the other side. When, however, the gentleman from Maine yields to gentlemen who do not wish to speak, the Chair thinks the gentleman had better allow the question to be taken.

Mr. HALE. I would be very glad if the Chair had originally brought the matter promptly to a vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would have done so, had he not thought that it would not be exactly fair to both sides.

Mr. HALE. I announced to the House in the first place that I had no desire to use any time. I was immediately appealed to personally by many gentlemen, friends of mine, for a little time, which I could not well refuse, as I did not want to use it myself. I have been anxious all the time to obtain an early vote and to get rid of this matter as soon as possible. If the Chair is now inclined to interpose to arrest the progress of the debate and bring the matter to a conclusion, I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is prepared to rule now upon the points involved. In so far as this paper is concerned—

Mr. DUNNELL. Is debate closed?

The SPEAKER. It is.

In so far as this paper alludes to the rules of the House, the Chair on yesterday decided that point: that a suspension of the rules vacated them and for that occasion made them inoperative.

So far as the constitutional point alluded to in this paper is concerned, the Chair on yesterday stated it was not within his province to construe the Constitution any more than it would be in the case of an amendment to cut off the House from determining whether such an amendment was contrary to law or not.

But in so far as this question of a protest is concerned and whether as a question of privilege it acquires the right to be read and the right to be placed upon the Journal, the Chair desires to refer to the proceedings of former Congresses. In the Third Congress, presided over by Mr. Muhlenberg, of Pennsylvania, Mr. Garnett, of Virginia, was allowed to spread upon the Journal the reasons of a vote given by him. In the Journal will be found the reasons in full, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Swift, of Maryland, moved that the House do reconsider the vote taken on Saturday last on the question Shall the declaration of Mr. Garnett then presented detailing the reasons for and motives of his vote on Thursday last on concurring with the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union in their agreement to the first resolution subjoined to the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs on the subject of a recognition of the independence of the late Spanish American provinces. And on the question Will the House reconsider the said vote? it passed in the affirmative.

And on the question Shall the said paper be placed on the Journal? it passed in the affirmative—yeas 89, nays 71.

The SPEAKER. The next precedent which the Chair has been able to consider was in the Twenty-eighth Congress, over which Mr. J. W. Jones, of Virginia, presided. New Hampshire, Georgia, Missouri, and Mississippi elected their Representatives by general ticket. Mr. Barnard, of New York, and forty-nine other members signed a protest against the admission of Representatives from said States. The Journal of the House says Mr. Barnard so framed his protest as to embody it in a resolution. Subsequently, on motion, the Journal was corrected so as to make it appear that the protest had got upon the Journal surreptitiously. It will be observed that the latter suggestion was the ground given for refusing it to be on the Journal. In both these cases, however, the papers were read and considered.

The next case to which the Chair has had his attention directed is a case in the Thirty-first Congress, and is the one occurring in the Senate alluded to in the Manual. The decision quoted in the Manual, page 249, under the heading of "Protest," was a protest on the part of certain Senators against the passage of a bill admitting California into the Union as a State. After extended debate the Senate decided by yeas 22 to nays 19 to lay the whole subject upon the table. This protest was signed by Senators Hunter and Mason of Virginia, Butler and Barnwell of South Carolina, Soule of Louisiana, Jefferson Davis of Mississippi, and other Senators. That paper appears of record, but did not go, the Chair presumes, on Senate Journal.

Clark, of Missouri, (I believe the father of a respected member of this House,) claimed the right to submit a preamble and resolution, but the Clerk in that case declined to entertain it, on the ground he had not the power to do so pending the organization of the House. The same was read however.

Again in the Thirty-ninth Congress, Mr. Brooks—it was the case alluded to yesterday—claimed the right to put upon the record a protest against the way in which the Clerk made up the roll of members. The record shows that it was inserted in the proceedings, but the Clerk declined to recognize it, because he was then acting under the operation of law which instructed him as to the making up of the roll of members.

It will thus be seen in every instance the Chair has mentioned the reading of the paper was allowed and that in one instance the Journal contains the protest.

The Chair, as an individual opinion, thinks that where a protest is respectful in terms no harm can come by allowing such courtesy as will place such respectful protest of record in the Journal, especially in a case where debate was not allowed and there was no possibility of amendment. Following, however, the rules which govern him in the administration of his duties as presiding officer, the Chair submits the question to the House itself to determine whether there is here presented or not a question of privilege. Those who think it involves a question of privilege will vote in the affirmative and those who are of a contrary opinion will vote in the negative.

The question being taken, the Speaker stated that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. STINGER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were—yeas 39, noes 142.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the whole vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MILLS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays have been ordered. I wish to make a suggestion. I think the House will agree that the protest shall be received and filed as a matter of courtesy, not as a right.

Several members called for the regular order.

The question being taken on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered, it was decided in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on taking the vote by yeas and nays.

The question being put, there were yeas 33, not one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. BEEBE. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HALE and Mr. MILLS were appointed. The House again divided; and the tellers reported yeas 47.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the question. Those who are of opinion that this paper contains a question of privilege and should be of record on the Journal will vote affirmatively and those of a contrary opinion will vote in the negative.

Mr. SAYLER. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair. Does the proposition submitted by the Chair to the House involve this additional idea that the offering of a protest is a privileged question in the sense that it takes precedence of all other business of the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides when a gentleman rises in his place and states he is on the floor on a question of privilege then the rule requires that that question should be disposed of at once, interrupting everything else.

Mr. SAYLER. In other words, that a vote in the affirmative is a vote to declare that the reception of a protest becomes a question of privilege when a gentleman rises to offer a protest.

The SPEAKER. The Chair submits to the House whether the matter presented in the protest is a question of privilege or not.

Mr. BURCHARD. That is, whether a protest of a member is a question of privilege.

Mr. KNOTT. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KNOTT. I desire to know if the question now is whether a member has a right as a matter of privilege to ask that his protest be entered on the Journal. I wish to know whether that is in question or not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks the gentleman from Kentucky to repeat his question.

Mr. KNOTT. My question is this: If the question now submitted to the House is whether a member has a right as a matter of privilege to ask that his protest be received and entered of record.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the way in which the question arose. The gentleman from New York rose in his place and stated he rose to a question of privilege. He then submits a paper and asks that it be read as part of his remarks thereon. The question that the Chair now submits to the House—and it is submitted in the manner provided in the Manual—is this: Is there a question of privilege involved in the matter set forth in that protest or that paper?

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. The question submitted to the House, in other words, is whether a protest is a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. It is whether the House will receive the matter presented in the paper as a question of privilege, and not every protest that may be offered. The question stated by the gentleman from Ohio is not involved.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to inquire whether the effect of this vote, if carried in the affirmative, is to receive and file the protest?

The SPEAKER. The effect of a vote in the affirmative is this, that the House declares that this paper, which is submitted by the gentleman from New York and which is described as a protest, is a question of privilege.

Mr. SPRINGER. And should go upon the record?

The SPEAKER. If the House decides that it is a question of privilege, it will go upon the Journal; not otherwise.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I understand that the vote is simply upon the question of whether this protest is a question of privilege, and not upon the question whether it shall be entered upon the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The Chair repeats, if it is a question of privilege it will go upon the Journal.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. But that is not the question now submitted to the vote of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question submitted is: is the matter in the protest a question of privilege?

Several members called for the regular order.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 52, nays 180, not voting 59; as follows:

So the paper presented by Mr. Cox, of New York, was decided not to involve a question of privilege.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made: Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. My colleague, Mr. BROGDEN, is still confined to his room by sickness.

Mr. CABELL. I am paired with Mr. PUGH, of New Jersey. Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. I am paired with Mr. BANKS. I do not know how he would vote upon this question, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I am paired with Mr. GIBSON, of Louisiana. If he were here, I should vote "no."

Mr. FORNEY. My colleague, Mr. SHELLEY, is paired with Mr. EVANS, of Indiana.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the protest be received and spread upon the Journal in courtesy to the members who signed it.

The question was taken and the motion was not agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPARKS, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4549) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various tribes for the year ending June 30, 1873, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPARKS. I desire to give notice that I shall call up the bill immediately after the post-office appropriation bill shall have been disposed of.

Mr. BURCHARD. And I desire to reserve all points of order upon the bill.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DURHAM. I rise to a question of privilege. I present a report of the committee of conference, which I ask to have read.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3102) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to employ temporary clerks, and making appropriations for the same; also making appropriations for detecting trespasses on the public lands and for bringing into market public lands in certain States, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 7, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: in lieu of "40" insert "20;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 8 and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: in lieu of said amendment substitute the following:

For railway post-office clerks, route agents, and mail-route agents, $7,000; and the Senate agree to the same.

M. J. DURHAM,

J. H. BLOUNT.

JNO. H. BAKER.

Managers on the part of the House.

WM. WINDOM,

S. W. DORSEY,

JAS. B. BECK.

Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. DURHAM. The House will remember that the balance of the bill has been agreed to by the two Houses, and this is a compromise upon the two clauses upon which the two Houses disagreed. I now move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. DURHAM moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THOMAS L. MOORE.

Mr. HUNTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4550) to remove the political disabilities of Thomas L. Moore; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HUNTON. I will state that the bill is accompanied by the usual petition.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

APPROVAL OF BILLS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, informed the House that the President had signed bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 1135) to authorize the issue of a patent to certain lands in the Brothertown reservation, in the State of Wisconsin, to the persons selected by the Brothertown Indians; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4242) to authorize the restoration of George A. Armes to the rank of captain.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RAINEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. No. 120) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the Canadian-built propeller East by the name of Kent;

A bill (S. No. 870) granting a pension to Rebecca and Augusta Miller, daughters of Brigadier-General James Miller, of the war of 1812; and

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted in the following cases:

To Mr. PHELPS, for one week.

FORT MACON LIGHT-HOUSE, NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. KENNA, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Commerce, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 2748, a bill (H. R. No. 4551) to establish a light-house near Fort Macon, North Carolina, and to provide day-beacons to mark the channels of Cove Sound; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

EVENING SESSIONS.

Mr. BRIGHT. I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution for consideration at this time. It is very important in relation to the public business.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there shall be evening sessions of the House of Representatives, beginning at 7.30 o'clock p. m., Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday of this week; Tuesday evening for general debate only; Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday for the consideration of the Private Calendar. The call of the Calendar shall begin with the first bill and one objection shall prevent the passage of a bill unless it has been previously objected to, in which case it shall require five objections. After all bills not objected to have been disposed of the Calendar shall be called for consideration.

Mr. CONGER. There are several bills to which I shall object at evening sessions, notwithstanding five objections have been made to them already.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. FINLEY objected to the resolution.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask for the correction of the Journal in relation to the bill (H. R. No. 151) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to refund to the Society of the Sons of St. George, established at Philadelphia, the sum of $1,440.25 in gold, being the amount paid by said society upon a colossal statue of St. George and the Dragon. It was reported from the Committee on Finance adversely instead of without amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal will be amended according to the correction suggested.

The Journal was approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the 18th ultimo, a report relative to the necessity for erecting beacon-lights to mark the channel on the line of inland navigation through North Landing River, Currituck Sound, and North River, North Carolina; which, on motion of Mr. MERRIMON, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented resolutions of the Commercial Exchange Association of Philadelphia, against the transfer of the life-savings service from the Treasury Department to the Navy Department, and in favor of the passage of the bill on the subject introduced in the House of Representatives by Mr. ROBERTS; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WALLACE. I present a memorial of publishers and booksellers of Philadelphia, remonstrating against the reduction of duties proposed by the bill known as the Wood tariff bill, and in favor of a commission of inquiry upon the subject of duties upon imports. This memorial is largely signed by houses of repute, including such as Henry C. Lea, J. B. Lippincott & Co., Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger, Porter & Coates, and others, the whole book-publishing trade of the city of Philadelphia. The memorial is brief, and I ask that it be read for the information of the Senate. It presents the points distinctly and forcibly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be read, there being no objection.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Finance, and read, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

We, the publishers and booksellers of Philadelphia, do most respectfully and earnestly protest against the reduction of the duty on books proposed in the tariff bill now before Congress, and we pray your honorable bodies that if any change be made it may be in converting ad valorem into specific rates. The unequal competition endured by all manufacturers in a community so highly taxed as ours, struggling against the cheaper labor, capital, and production of Europe, is rendered especially oppressive in the article of books by reason of the nature of the business. The foreign producer, secure in his own market, whence his profit is derived, ships to this country his surplus, content with a fractional profit over the mere cost of paper and press-work, and under an ad valorem rate his invoice at such cost may not unfrequently enable him to introduce his goods at a duty of but 5 or 10 per cent. on the ordinary price, instead of 25 per cent., as is the intention of the existing tariff. Under such a competition the interests connected with the book manufacture, including printers, binders, paper-makers, and others, are already suffering severely, and the proposed reduction of the duty to 20 per cent. threatens still further prostration, while an alteration to a specific rate of twenty or twenty-five cents per pound or a judicious combination of specific and ad valorem rates would put an end to undervaluations, would benefit the honest importer, would increase the revenues, and would lend a much-needed support to an industry which for moral as well as commercial reasons deserves the utmost consideration at your hands.

We further respectfully represent that, in our opinion, in the existing depressed condition of all the industries of the country, the agitation of the tariff question is ill-advised, and we especially deprecate the principle of the pending bill in placing on the free list all unenumerated articles, thus making free trade the rule and protection incidental. We therefore earnestly pray that the whole subject of tariff legislation be postponed until there may be an opportunity for careful investigation into details, and a measure can be framed which will be just alike to consumer and producer and may be regarded as permanent.

We also believe that in the bill for classification of mail matter, now before Congress, the clause allowing books to be imported free of duty through the mails threatens grave injury to all the industries concerned in the manufacture of books, and we therefore protest against it as a flagrant injustice and as a precedent of which the logical development would be to transfer a large portion of the importation of general merchandise from the custom-house to the post-office.

Mr. MORGAN presented the petition of Mary J. Padgett, of Allenton, Wilcox County, Alabama, praying compensation for property taken and appropriated by United States military forces during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of the heirs of Thomas K. Beck, deceased, late of Wilcox County, Alabama, praying compensation for fifty-seven bales of cotton taken and appropriated by the officers of the United States Government during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of the passage of an act by Congress for the equalization of bounties; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Gager, praying compensation for property alleged to have been taken during the rebellion for the use of the Government, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Sands, praying to be advanced ten numbers in his grade, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 1132) for the relief of Lieutenant-Commander James H. Sands, United States Navy.

The bill was read twice by its title, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WHYTE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 973) for the relief of Charles O. Allibone, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Commander William Gibson, United States Navy, retired, praying for reinstatement on the active list of the Navy, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 1133) for the relief of William Gibson.

The bill was read twice by its title, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance, to whom the following bills were referred, to report them back to the Senate:

The bill (S. No. 71) to repeal the act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments;" the bill (S. No. 157) providing for coining of silver dollars, and for making the same a legal tender; the bill (S. No. 86) to authorize the coining of a dollar of 412½ grains standard silver, and for other purposes; the bill (S. No. 70) to repeal section 3 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875; the bill (S. No. 68) authorizing the coining of the standard silver dollar, and restoring its legal-tender character; and the bill (S. No. 31) to authorize the payment of 50 per cent. of customs duties in legal-tender notes. These bills relate to subjects that have already been acted upon by the Senate, or upon which bills have been reported. I move that the Committee on Finance be discharged therefrom.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I am also instructed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 273) to encourage and protect the shipping interest and to revive American commerce, to report it back. It is a bill that should originate in the House, if at all. I move that the committee be discharged from its further consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar will be taken up, if there be no objection, and the first case on the Calendar will be reported.

Mr. McMILLAN. Before proceeding to the Calendar, I move to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 576) to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of merchandise.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President—

Mr. McMILLAN. If the Senator will permit me, I will state the reason why I make the motion. The bill is a matter of some public importance. It relates to the transportation of merchandise in small packages. It amends the statute in regard to the transportation of imported merchandise so as to permit trunks and small packages of goods and bales corded and sealed to be transported under the regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury to inland ports where there are officers of appraisement, so that the goods shall not be detained at New York for appraisal.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask the Senator whether or not the bill is on the Calendar.

Mr. McMILLAN. It is.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Then it will be reached in the regular order. I think it due to Senators who are not in the habit of pressing their bills out of order, but wait for them to be reached on the Calendar regularly, that we should proceed with the Calendar. We gave way yesterday morning, and the whole day was consumed. The day before that the Senate also gave way. There is a special order to proceed with the Calendar. I hope the Senator from Minnesota will not press his motion.

Mr. McMILLAN. There is no local interest subserved in any way in my State by the bill. It is a bill of general importance, and I merely having reported it from the Committee on Commerce, desire to present the question so that the Senate may proceed to the consideration of it, if they will. I have discharged my duty, if there is objection made. I should be glad to have the Senate take up the bill. I appreciate the force of the remarks made by the Senator from West Virginia; but if he will, as to this particular measure, see proper to permit it to pass, I shall be obliged to him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota move to proceed to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. McMILLAN. I make that motion.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I believe the Calendar is the regular order, is it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is, after one o'clock. It is subject to the order of the Senate at any time.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. When the morning business was exhausted the Chair so announced, and I called for the Calendar. That I reckon has as high privilege as anything else. I do not want to make any special opposition in regard to this matter, as there is only half an hour left of the morning hour; but Senators will readily see that unless we proceed with the Calendar we shall not get through with it at all. The bill moved by the Senator from Minnesota will perhaps prove to be an unobjectionable case. We shall reach it certainly to-day or to-morrow, and a short time cannot make any difference. If each Senator has a special bill to be taken up out of its order on the Calendar, and it leads to controversy, we shall continue in the discussion of that class of bills, and the unobjectionable cases on the Calendar will not be reached, which I think would be wrong.

Mr. McMILLAN. If the matter leads to controversy, I shall withdraw the application, but I do not think it will.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask that we proceed with the Calendar.

Mr. PADDOCK. I suppose one objection in the morning hour will not carry the bill over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was about to state to the Senator from West Virginia that he called for the regular order, pending which the Senator from Minnesota moved to proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated, and the latter motion was entertained within the morning hour. At one o'clock, what is known as the Anthony rule being enforced, the Calendar would be before the Senate, when it would require a motion to displace it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I concur with the Chair perfectly. I moved that we proceed with the Calendar, and I insist that the Calendar would be before the Senate unless the Senator from Minnesota should move to lay aside that order, or to amend my motion, or something of the kind. My intention was to proceed to the Calendar. However, that is a question that is now settled by the Chair, and it is for the Senate to determine whether we shall go on with the Calendar now.

Mr. PADDOCK. I hope there will be no objection to the bill moved by the Senator from Minnesota. It is a bill that has been petitioned for very generally by business men in all the larger towns of the West, Northwest, and Southwest. It seems to me it ought to be considered at as early a day as practicable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator from Minnesota has withdrawn his motion.

Mr. McMILLAN. No, sir, I have not withdrawn it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota moves the present consideration of the bill named.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I hope the Senate will go on with the Calendar. The bill is on the Calendar and will be reached to-day or to-morrow.

Mr. McMILLAN. I see it will take more time to discuss this question than it would to pass the bill if it were properly before the Senate, and I withdraw my motion to proceed to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn, and the consideration of the Calendar will be resumed at the point left off when it was last before the Senate.

RANCHO LAS CRUCES.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first bill on the Calendar at the point where its consideration is now resumed is the bill (S. No. 520) to authorize the claimants to certain lands in Santa Barbara County, California, to submit their claim to the United States district court for that State for adjudication.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the claimants to lands situated in Santa Barbara County, California, known as the Rancho Las Cruces, who de-claim title through the original Mexican grantee of the rancho, to present their claim to the United States district court in and for the district of California for examination; and if, upon hearing of the case, it shall appear to the court that the claim of the original grantee was good and valid under Mexican laws relating to such cases, the court shall by decree confirm the claim.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Private Land Claims with an amendment, to add to the proviso at the end of the first section:

Nor shall any decree of confirmation affect any valid adverse right of any other person or persons, or give to the confirmees, or any of them, any claim upon the United States for compensation for any land such confirmees may lose by reason of pre-emption or homestead claims or adverse rights as aforesaid;

So as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That no lands shall be confirmed to said claimants by said decree to which there are valid claims existing under the pre-emption or homestead laws of the United States at the date of the passage of this act, nor shall any decree of confirmation affect, &c.

Mr. GROVER. There is a written report from the Committee on Private Land Claims, which was unanimously presented upon the bill. I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. GROVER March 8:

The Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 520) to authorize claimants to certain lands in Santa Barbara County, California, to submit their claims to the United States district court for that State for adjudication, submit the following report:

The attorneys for the claimants have submitted a printed pamphlet containing their petition to Congress and copies of all affidavits and matters of record which have been filed in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, for the purpose of procuring a withdrawal of the lands in question from disposal by the United States, pending this application, as well as for the purpose of perpetuating testimony. An examination of the original papers in the General Land Office has been made, and the printed copies have been compared with the originals and found to be true copies.

By these evidences it appears that Miguel Cordero, a Mexican citizen, in the year 1834, settled upon the lands since known as the Rancho Las Cruces, now in Santa Barbara County, California, but then within the domain of Mexico. That in the year 1837 said Cordero, on his petition, received from the proper authorities a grant, evidenced of record in the usual form, to said rancho, two leagues in length and one league in width, marked by certain distinct natural boundaries, which have since been definitely ascertained by survey, according to the public surveys of the United States. That the usual judicial possession was given by the neighboring alcalde in due form required by the laws of Mexico.

The keeper of the Spanish and Mexican archives in the United States surveyor-general's office for California certifies that the original documents in this case are genuine; that the copies are true translations; and that they constitute what would have been considered a perfect grant under the Mexican government of California. He further certifies that he is familiar with the section of country in which the said tract of land is located, and that the same can, without difficulty, be ascertained from the calls of the title papers and the accompanying map. In fact the record presents every link in the chain of a perfect expediente. The treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, concluded May 30, 1848, between the United States and Mexico, by which California was acquired by the United States, found Cordero and his family in possession of Las Cruces, improved with orchards, vineyards, and grain-fields, and largely stocked with cattle and horses.

The treaty provided (Article 8) that "Mexicans now established in territories previously belonging to Mexico and which remain for the future within the limits of the United States, as defined by the present treaty, shall be free to continue where they now reside, or to remove at any time to the Mexican Republic, retaining the property which they possess in said territories."

The cession did not impair the rights of private property. They were consecrated by the law of nations and protected by the treaty. (United States vs. Moreno, 1 Wall., 404.)

By act of Congress of March 3, 1851, authority is given for a board of commissioners to ascertain and settle private land claims in California, originating under the Spanish or Mexican Governments, and for a confirmation of the same, with right of review in the United States district courts and appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. (9 Statutes, 63.)

Section 13 of this act provides, among other things, that "all lands, the claims to which shall not have been presented to said commissioners within two years after the date of this act, shall be deemed held, and considered a part of the public domain of the United States." This limit was subsequently extended to March 3, 1855.

In March, 1851, after the passage of the last named act, but before its promulgation in California, Cordero died intestate, in possession of the Rancho Las Cruces. The premises were distant from the sitting or the commission subsequently organized to pass upon this class of titles. The family spoke none but the Spanish tongue, read no newspapers, and were wholly illiterate. The Mexican authorities had cared for private titles with such certainty that no doubt was felt as to their rights. The limitation of the act of March 3, 1851, and its extension expired before the heirs of Cordero knew that their titles to Las Cruces was not fully protected. The Cordero title has been respected by all adjacent settlers from the time of his possession to the present day. The Commissioner of the General Land Office has directed the withdrawal of these lands from public disposal, and nothing stands in the way of justice to the heirs of Cordero, except the absence of statutory authority to recognize their rights.

Under these circumstances your committee recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendment:

At the end of section 1 of the bill add "nor shall any decree of confirmation affect any valid adverse rights of any other person or persons, or give to the confirmees, or any of them, any claim upon the United States for compensation for any land such confirmees may lose by reason of pre-emption or homestead claims or adverse rights as aforesaid."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS IN NEW MEXICO.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 753) to confirm a certain private land claim in the Territory of New Mexico.

Mr. EATON. At my request the Senator having that bill in charge consents that it may go over for a day or two, and I shall then call it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

WILLIAM W. SPIERS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 594) for the relief of William W. Spiers, late assistant surgeon United States Army; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of War to pay to William W. Spiers, late assistant surgeon in the United States Army, such additional sum of money as will make his entire compensation equal to that of assistant surgeon during the period of his active service in that capacity and of his imprisonment in rebel prisons as a prisoner of war, estimating the period from the date of his commission as surgeon.

Mr. MORRILL. I think there had better be an explanation on the part of the Senator who reported the bill.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I ask that the report be read. The bill, I see, is accompanied by a report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. PLUMB March 19:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 594) for the relief of William W. Spiers, late assistant surgeon United States Army, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

It appears from the records of the War Department that on the 20th of September, 1863, Dr. Spiers was a private and acting hospital steward of Company H, Twenty-second Regiment Indiana Volunteers, on the battle-field of Chickamunga; that he was ordered to remain with the wounded, and in consequence was captured by the enemy and held until April, 1864, when he escaped, and entered the Union lines on the 10th of that month. Not being aware that he was in the hands of the enemy, the Secretary of War, September 21, 1863, appointed him an assistant surgeon of the Third United States Colored Troops, but he did not receive the notice of his appointment until after his return. In the mean time, the services of an assistant surgeon being required, another person was appointed to the position, and there was no vacancy for Spiers to fill upon his return. He was, however, appointed assistant surgeon of the One hundred and second Regiment United States Colored Troops, was mustered, and joined for duty June 6, 1864.

By the second section of the joint resolution of July 11, 1870, it was provided "that persons held as prisoners of war by the enemy, or who may have been in hospital by reason of wounds or disability at the time of the issuing of their commissions, shall be entitled to the same pay, emoluments, and benefits, under this resolution, as if actually performing the duties of the grade to which they were commissioned."

The third section of the same act provides "that this resolution shall not be construed to apply to cases in which, under the laws and army regulations existing at the time, there could have been no lawful muster into service, even after the actual receipt of the commission."

The Adjutant-General of the Army, in declining to afford relief under the said joint resolution of July 11, 1870, so construes the section last quoted as to entirely neutralize the effect of the statute and to make it inoperative for the relief of anybody. The act was intended to reach that highly meritorious class of soldiers who, having been captured by the enemy while in the discharge of their duty or confined in hospital on account of wounds received in service, were unable to present themselves for muster and duty. The Adjutant-General cites General Orders No. 48, series of 1863, which provides that "an officer must present his commission or appointment" under which he desires to be mustered. It could not have been the intention of Congress to make its legislation on this subject dependent upon that restriction, because in that case the legislation would have been entirely ineffective.

The same order also contains a provision that "no officer shall be mustered in to date back beyond the time that he has actually been performing the duties of the grade into which he desires to be mustered." We think it perfectly clear that Congress could not have intended that this order should apply to and control such cases as the one before us, otherwise its enactment would have been utterly without purpose, and the very class of persons whom it was designed to relieve could not possibly have been benefited by it.

The committee hold that the real intention of the third section of the act referred to was to prevent the muster in of officers to cover periods during which they could not have been mustered, if present, owing to the reduced strength of their commands or some other legal disability. In this case there can be no question of that kind. The appointment of Dr. Spiers directly by the Secretary of War would imply that within the knowledge of the Department the vacancy existed and could be legally filled. More than that, it was noted upon the letter of appointment signed by the Secretary of War that "acceptance of this appointment will be your muster into service." This we think is entirely conclusive as against any doubt that might otherwise have arisen as to the right of Dr. Spiers to be mustered at the time of his appointment.

The bill simply allows Dr. Spiers the difference between the pay that he did receive and the pay of an assistant surgeon during the seven months of his imprisonment, and the committee recommend its passage.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ROBERT COLES.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 312) for the relief of Robert Coles; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The preamble recites that, according to the laws of the State of Iowa, Robert Coles is the rightful owner of indemnity certificates No. 92, for two thousand three hundred and sixty-three acres and twenty-six hundredths of an acre, dated March 28, 1872, and No. 93, for thirty-six acres and thirty-six hundredths of an acre, dated April 10, 1872; and that the ownership of these certificates accrued to Coles by virtue of a contract between him and the board of supervisors of the county of Lucas, Iowa, dated November —, 1862, as provided by the laws of the State of Iowa; and that the list of swamp selections, upon which these indemnity certificates were subsequently issued, was approved by the surveyor-general for the State of Iowa March 3, 1859, of which approval the county judge of Lucas County, Iowa, was notified by letter from the surveyor-general's office of that date, and of which approval the then agent for the State of Iowa and of Lucas County by affidavit testifies; and that the proof for indemnity under act of March 2, 1855, was submitted to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and filed for action therein June 20, 1860; and that the surveyor-general failed to certify his approval of said list of selections to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, as required by the honorable Secretary of the Interior at the time of approval thereof; and that had the list of selections been certified up to the General Land Office at the time the same was approved by the surveyor-general, there were large quantities of public lands in the State of Iowa upon which indemnity certificates could have been located; and that a full and valuable consideration was paid by Coles for the interest of Lucas County in and to the swamp lands thereof, to wit, one thousand and ninety acres of land, valued at $6,000; and that at the time the certificates were issued there were no vacant public lands in the State of Iowa upon which the same could be located, owing to the delay and neglect of the surveyor-general; and as a part of the terms of the contract between Coles and the board of supervisors of the county of Lucas that "if compatible with the public interest the patent for the lands granted in indemnity should be issued in his name."

The bill therefore requires the Commissioner of the General Land Office to issue warrants, in lieu of the indemnity certificates numbered 92 and 93, to Robert Coles, in accordance with the legal subdivisions of the public lands, in quantities not less than eighty acres, which may be located by Coles, his heirs or assigns, upon any of the public lands not mineral lands, or one-half the number of acres named in each warrant upon lands at $2.50 per acre, if the locations do not interfere with prior pre-emption or homestead rights. And patents may issue therefor the same as provided for military bounty land warrants or lands sold for cash.

The Committee on Public Lands reported the bill with an amendment striking out, after the word "acres" in line 8, the words:

Which may be located by the said Robert Coles, his heirs or assigns, upon any of the public lands not mineral lands, or one-half the number of acres named in each warrant upon lands at $2.50 per acre.

And in lieu thereof inserting:

Which warrants shall only be received from actual settlers in payment of pre-emption claims or in commutation of homestead claims, in the same manner and to the same extent as is now authorized by law in the case of military bounty land warrants.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to amend the amendment. I have shown this amendment to the members of the committee and there is no objection to it, I believe, on the part of the committee. I move, in line 8, after the word "acres," to insert the following:

Which may be located by the said Robert Coles, his heirs or assigns, upon any of the public lands not mineral or coal, or double-minimum lands, subject to entry by pre-emption or under the provisions of the homestead act.

And in line 12 of the committee's amendment to strike out the words "shall only" and insert "may also."

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask the Senator whether this is an amendment of the committee or an individual amendment of his own?

Mr. ALLISON. An amendment which I have shown to the committee and which they do not object to.

Mr. PADDOCK. It is not an amendment of the committee.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. If the committee accept it, very well.

Mr. ALLISON. I believe I did not show it to the honorable Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. PADDOCK,] but I have shown it to the other members of the committee, and I understand them not to object to it.

Mr. McDONALD. I think the amendment is in accordance with the purpose of the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. It is in accordance with the substantial purpose of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUSAN ROBB.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 847) for the relief of Susan Robb; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to adjust and settle the claim of Susan Robb, mother and nearest heir of Levi R. Robb, late second lieutenant of Company H, Forty-fifth Pennsylvania Volunteers, and allow her the sum of $135, the same being "three months' extra pay proper," with a proviso that no charges stand against the officer on the books of the Treasury Department.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RAILROAD FROM PORTLAND TO ASTORIA AND M'MINNVILLE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 306) amendatory of the act entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Portland to Astoria and McMinnville, in the State of Oregon."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let that go over. It is a general bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over. The next case will be stated.

SOUTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 474) to authorize the Southern Pacific Railroad Company to extend its railroad and telegraph line easterly from its present eastern terminus in Arizona to a point on the Rio Grande at or near El Paso, and to aid in building the same.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a bill of the same character. It is a general bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

TEXAS PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 942) amendatory of and supplementary to the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1871, and the several acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto.

Mr. PADDOCK. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

JOHN CUTLER.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 906) releasing the title of the United States in a certain parcel of land to the assigns of John Cutler; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It releases to the assigns of John Cutler the title of the United States to that parcel of land containing thirty-eight and thirty-one hundredths acres, lying near Visalia, in the county of Tulare, State of California, which was conveyed to the United States by John Cutler on the 2d of October, 1865.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report.

Mr. BOOTH. There is no written report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator can explain it.

Mr. BOOTH. I can explain it in a moment. In 1863 there was a company of United States troops ordered to Visalia. Some of the leading citizens of that village subscribed and bought thirty-nine acres of land for an encampment which they supposed would be permanent. They made an instrument, as they supposed, leasing it to the United States without any pay during its occupation. The troops only remained for a short time. After they were ordered away, the citizens, not knowing that they had conveyed the title and not intending to convey it, sold it and reimbursed themselves. The purchaser supposed he had a perfect title until a year or two ago when he wanted to sell. Then the searcher of titles told him the fee was in the United States. The United States paid nothing for the property and paid nothing for its occupancy. This bill is to confirm the title to the man who purchased under them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Are there any buildings on it?

Mr. BOOTH. I think not. The United States never put any improvements on it, never paid anything for it, and if the Senator will look at the bill again he will see that it is so guarded that unless it is the identical land described in the bill nothing will pass.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the bill read again, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 4550) to remove the political disabilities of Thomas L. Moore, of the State of Virginia; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4236) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3102) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to employ temporary clerks, and making an appropriation for the same; also making appropriations for detecting trespass on public lands, and for bringing into market public lands in certain States, and for other purposes.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR DETECTING TRESPASSES, ETC.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask consent of the Senate to make a report from a conference committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive it.

Mr. WINDOM submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3102) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to employ temporary clerks, and making an appropriation for the same; also making appropriations for detecting trespass on public lands, and for bringing into market public lands in certain States, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 7, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: in lieu of "40" insert "20;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 8, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: in lieu of said amendment substitute the following:

For railway post-office clerks, route agents, and mail route messengers, $7,000; and the Senate agree to the same.

WM. WINDOM,

S. W. DORSEY,

JAS. B. BECK,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

M. J. DURHAM,

J. H. BLOUNT,

JNO. H. BAKER,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WINDOM. The two items on which the second committee of conference disagreed, and which were referred to the committee whose report I now submit, were first $40,000, a deficiency for collectors of internal revenue, and $20,000 for additional post-route agents, &c. The conference committee have agreed to $20,000 for the collectors' item, and $7,000 for the mail-route agents' item; partly upon this ground, that so much time has elapsed since this deficiency was asked for, nearly one-half the time that it was designed to apply to, that the reduced items will probably answer for the service of the residue of the year. It was not in either case what may be called an absolute deficiency. It was a deficiency in this, that if the money were not appropriated the service could not be so efficiently conducted as with it. In the case of the collectors, for instance, the money appropriated is to pay additional service in collectors' offices in the various localities where there is an extraordinary pressure of business, and of course if they had not the money they could not employ them, and they have not been enabled to employ some that perhaps should have been for the last two months, but this will enable them to do so for the next two.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is an efficiency bill.

Mr. WINDOM. It is an efficiency rather than a deficiency bill, as my friend from Vermont suggests.

The report was concurred in.

AMENDMENT TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 4286) to establish post-roads in the several States therein named; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL BANK OF WESTERN ARKANSAS.

The bill (S. No. 250) for the relief of the National Bank of Western Arkansas, was announced as the business next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. GARLAND. There is an adverse report in that case, and I ask that it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

NICHOLAS WAX AND OTHERS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 913) for the relief of Nicholas Wax, Michael Granary, and Moline Lange; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Nicholas Wax, Michael Granary, and Moline Lange each the sum of $500, in refundment of so much money exacted from them as joint obligors on a bond taken by Colonel D. A. Pardee, provost-marshal of the district of Baton Rouge, Louisiana, in the year 1863, for the appearance of one B. F. Rhodes, the payment of which was improperly and illegally enforced by the marshal.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the report in that case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. TELLER on the 20th of March:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Michael Granary, Nicholas Wax, and Moline Lange, praying to have refunded to them $500 each, being for the amount collected from them, respectively, on a bond given to the provost-marshal of the district of Baton Rouge, Louisiana, in 1863, for the appearance of one B. F. Rhodes to answer a criminal charge preferred against him, have had the same under consideration, and make the following report:

The facts connected with this claim, as ascertained from the proofs, documentary and otherwise, as well as the sworn petition of the claimants, are, that while the district of Baton Rouge, Louisiana, was under military law, a certain B. F. Rhodes was arrested by the order of Colonel D. A. Pardee, then provost-marshal of that district, and imprisoned upon a criminal charge; and that prisoner being sick, made application to claimants to enter into bond for his appearance when required in the sum of $1,500, the claimants to be bound in the sum of $500 each. The bond was executed, and the prisoner discharged; that, being sick at the time of his discharge, the prisoner went to the residence of his sister, where very soon he died of what was supposed to have been small-pox; that upon the application of claimants to be discharged from their bond they were told by the provost-marshal that they were still bound, notwithstanding the death of their principal, and that unless they paid the amount of the bond they would be imprisoned; that claimants declined to pay and were actually imprisoned, and thereby compelled to pay the required sum in order to be released from prison. Receipts were given to the claimants for the sum of $500 each. The committee are satisfied that the bond taken was conditioned for the appearance of the prisoner, and that his death occurred before there was a forfeiture of the bond.

It appears by an extract furnished by the War Department that Pardee reported this fund as in his hands, and was charged with it in the settlement of account with the Provost-Marshal General.

As the money has gone into the Treasury, and the claimants were not in default, the committee recommend that it be returned to the claimants, and report the accompanying bill and recommend its passage.

The bill was reported to the Senate.
 Mr. KERNAN. Did the money go into the Treasury?
 Mr. EDMUNDS. The report says it did.
 Mr. TELLER. The report does say so.
 Mr. KERNAN. All right.
 The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RICHMOND FEMALE INSTITUTE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 61) for the relief of the Richmond Female Institute of Richmond, Virginia.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will state that that bill passed the Senate at the last session of the last Congress, having been reported favorably from the Committee on Claims by myself, and it is now reported by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] at this Congress. The report may be read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We have a chance to review that now. Let us hear the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin objects. The bill will go over.

JAMES FISHBACK.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2096) for the relief of James Fishback, late collector of internal revenue, tenth district, State of Illinois.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill has been before the Senate on a prior occasion, read the third time, and the question was on its passage, upon which the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] has the bill in charge. The merits of the bill I do not want to say anything about. I objected to the bill being considered the last time it was before the Senate upon the ground that Mr. Fishback was a defaulter when he went out of office. As I said before, I know nothing about the merits of this particular claim. He was not technically a defaulter at that time. I have reason to believe from correspondence from Illinois that, in order to enable him to pay his indebtedness to the Government, he borrowed a considerable sum of money from his sureties, and that a good portion of that money has never been paid to them. The object I had when I objected to this bill before was to see if there could not be in some way a substitution of these gentlemen instead of Fishback for the moneys that they had paid in his behalf; but I have considered the subject since then, and I do not know that the Senate can settle the equities between these parties. So far as that is concerned, I abandon my opposition if the Senate is satisfied that the bill is a proper one to be passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to say simply that as the matter of the alleged defalcation of this officer has been mentioned in the Senate, it is perhaps due to him that certain communications from the Department that have been addressed to him should be submitted to the Senate, referring particularly to the facts of his accounts having been, in the various positions he has held under the Government, settled with the Government to the last cent of his liability. I believe the Senator from Illinois [Mr. OGLESBY] has the custody—

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Allow me one minute. I have no doubt that all his accounts were settled with the Government, and I stated that I withdrew my opposition on the ground that he was a defaulter. I still have no doubt that he obtained money in order to settle with the Government, from gentlemen who were on his bond and that that money has not been paid back; but as I stated before, I withdraw all opposition on that account, on the ground that the Senate cannot settle the equities between the parties. I have no doubt of that at all.

Mr. HARRIS. I did not misunderstand the Senator from Illinois, and the suggestion I made was simply this: in view of the fact that the question of defalcation had been mentioned in connection with this party and this claim, I am inclined to think that it is perhaps due to the gentleman that the communications from the Department touching that question and clearly vindicating him, as the Senator immediately before me from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] admits, should be read. However, the Senator from Illinois on my right [Mr. OGLESBY] has possession of these papers. I shall not ask for their reading. I have examined them, and am perfectly satisfied he has never been a defaulter to the Government.

Mr. OGLESBY. I had supposed after the remarks submitted by my colleague that there would be no objection in the Senate to passing this bill for relief. The Committee on Claims has reported it to the Senate, and there can be no doubt that so far as the claim is concerned it is entirely just and ought to be granted by Congress, and I suppose on a vote by yeas and nays the bill will pass. That being so, I do not care to get up and take up the time of the Senate by reading an affidavit or having read by the Clerk an affidavit of Mr. Fishback which explains very fully how he borrowed this money, whom he borrowed it from, and he has a communication from one of the gentlemen from whom he borrowed the money which—

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. If my colleague will allow me, what is the use of going into this when it has nothing to do with the question whether the Senate shall pass this bill? I withdraw my opposition to it and admit that the claimant was not technically a defaulter.

Mr. OGLESBY. If my colleague will hear me a moment further, I will say that I did not intend to submit any remarks upon it; but the Senator from Tennessee very kindly alluded to me as having certain papers, and Mr. Fishback might feel that his interests had been entirely overlooked and neglected unless some explanation was made of the matter. I made up my mind not to ask the Clerk to read his affidavit and not to ask to encumber the Record with page after page of exculpatory evidence from all the Departments of the Government where he has ever served as clerk, as assessor, and as collector, showing an entire official acquittal of all liability on his part at any time as a public functionary. I did not care to have that read to encumber the Record and take up the time of the Senate; but it is perhaps no more than right to say in explanation of Mr. Fishback's connection with what has been said of his borrowing money to pay this deficit, that it is true he did borrow money from certain honorable gentlemen in Jacksonville, Illinois, who loaned to him to settle his balance $2,000 or $3,000 I believe. He settled the balance and gave them securities with which to make them secure. Those men and Mr. Fishback have not yet settled. That matter between them is purely a private transaction. I do not care to put all this on the record, for I suppose there is no real objection to granting the relief.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill. The roll-call will proceed.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 37, nays 6; as follows:

JOHN WATERS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 955) for the relief of the estate of John Waters, deceased; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill appropriates $1,825, to pay to the estate of John Waters, for the rent of a house in Nashville, Tennessee, from December, 1863, to January, 1865, for the use of the Army of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

W. B. GOSA.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 956) for the relief of W. P. Grace, as the administrator of W. B. Gosa; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment of $600, to pay to W. P. Grace, as the administrator of W. B. Gosa, for the rent of houses in Pine Bluff, Arkansas, from September, 1865, to February, 1866, for the use of the Army of the United States.

Mr. MCCREERY. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out all after the words "pay to," in line 5, and in lieu thereof insert: James Trabue, of Louisville, Kentucky, holder and owner of six certified accounts issued to W. B. Gosa, of Pine Bluff, Arkansas, as agent for said James Trabue.

Mr. SARGENT. Is that for the same transaction?

Mr. MORGAN. The amendment of the Senator from Kentucky was not before me when I made the report of the Committee on Claims. It is now suggested that there was an adverse claim. Inasmuch as that committee has had no opportunity to consider the case in the light of this claim, I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Claims, with the amendment.

Mr. MCCREERY. I present the evidence in the matter to go with the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The papers will accompany the reference. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The motion was agreed to.

MICHAEL CALLAHAN.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 957) for the relief of Michael Callahan.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report on that case.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. MORGAN on the 20th of March:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred a bill for the relief of Michael Callahan, of Huntsville, Alabama, submit the following report:

The claimant presents five certified quartermasters' vouchers for rent of property at Huntsville, Alabama, during the months of August, September, October, and November, 1864, and January, February, March, April, May, June, August, September, November, and December, 1865, amounting to $113.66.

The following is written on the face of the vouchers for the months prior to August 1, 1865:

"To be settled hereafter as the Government may direct, the claimant being considered loyal."

The accounting officers of the Treasury rejected this claim on the ground that it was among those prohibited to be paid by them under the act of Congress of February 21, 1867.

These claims were reported by the depot quartermaster at Huntsville, Alabama, as being due, and were so borne upon their accounts.

They were referred by the Third Auditor of the Treasury to the Quartermaster-General, by whom they were examined and found to be correct. In certifying the claims back to the accounting officers of the Treasury, the Quartermaster-General says: "Payment is not conditional on proof of loyalty. The services have been reported to this office as required by the regulations."

In this case the loyalty of the claimant is vouched for on the face of each certificate given him during the period of hostilities, and it is not to be presumed that the officers of the Army would improperly or heedlessly give such a certificate to a disloyal person.

Your committee recommend that the claim be allowed, and report as a substitute for the bill referred to them (S. No. 271) the following bill, and recommend its passage.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to know why this is not a claim that falls within the jurisdiction of the southern claims commission; and in the absence of an answer I object to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is objected to, and goes over.

ANNULMENT OF A TERRITORIAL ACT.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 878) to disapprove and annul an act of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, passed on the 18th of January, 1878, by a two-third vote of both houses over the veto of the governor of said Territory; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill disapproves and makes null and void an act of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, entitled "An act to incorporate the Society of the Jesuit Fathers of New Mexico," which passed both houses of the Assembly on or about the 18th day of January, 1874, over the veto of the governor, being in violation of section 1889 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which declares, "The Legislative Assemblies of the several Territories shall not grant private charters or especial privileges," said bill being a grant of a private charter or act of incorporation, with the "especial privileges" of an unlimited power to acquire, hold, and transfer all kinds of property, both real and personal, and the exemption from taxation of all the effects and property of a corporation.

Mr. GARLAND. The Committee on Territories were unanimously of opinion that the act of the Legislative Assembly of New Mexico was in direct conflict with section 1889 of the Revised Statutes, which I send to the desk and ask the Secretary to read for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 1889. The Legislative Assemblies of the several Territories shall not grant private charters or especial privileges, but they may, by general incorporation acts, permit persons to associate themselves together as bodies corporate for mining, manufacturing, and other industrial pursuits, or the construction or operation of railroads, wagon-roads, irrigating ditches, and the colonization and improvement of lands in connection therewith, or for colleges, seminaries, churches, libraries, or any benevolent, charitable or scientific association.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. PADDOCK. Is there any explanation of this bill?

Mr. GARLAND. I stated that this act of the Territory of New Mexico is in direct conflict with section 1889, which the Secretary has just read, and the Committee on Territories, finding such to be the case, without a dissenting voice reported the bill. It is an act that grants special privileges without any limitation or restriction whatever, which is forbidden by section 1889 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. PADDOCK. I did not hear the Senator before.

The bill was passed.

DEFICIENCY IN PRINTING APPROPRIATION.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask unanimous consent to take from the table the deficiency bill for public printing which I reported yesterday. There is a pressing necessity that action should be had on this bill, and I think it will require but a few moments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 4222) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriation for the public printing and binding for the current fiscal year.

Mr. WINDOM. The estimate for the printing and binding for the current year was $1,991,727.51. The amount appropriated in the regular appropriation bill for that purpose was $1,301,000, the amount received by the office from the sales of waste paper, &c., was $26,424.78, making a total of $1,327,424.78 available under the regular appropriation and the receipts from the source named for the year.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do the sales of waste paper remain to be expended without being turned over to the Treasury?

Mr. WINDOM. I will say to the Senator that that is a fact entirely new to myself until this morning. I find it in a letter I have from the Printing Office.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it ought not to be so.

Mr. WINDOM. I think it is not right myself, and my attention was never called to it until this morning, and I have mentioned it in connection with the state of the accounts of the office. It is a matter which I think ought hereafter be examined myself. The amount then available for the year, was $664,302.73 less than the amount estimated. We have already passed a deficiency of $70,000; namely for the Post Office Department $35,000, for the Congressional Library $20,000, for the Supreme Court $15,000. There is also pending in House bill No. 3740 which is now in conference, for the Interior Department $40,000, for the War Department $18,000, and for the Navy Department $950. I will say, however, that these items, which are pending in that bill, are items which were put on by the Senate and have not yet been agreed to in conference.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. All of them?

Mr. WINDOM. I do not remember positively about that for the Interior Department, but I think it was not all added by the Senate. A portion of it was. The bill is not before me, and I cannot state exactly the amount added by the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. My recollection was that some portion was put on by the House.

Mr. WINDOM. I think the Senator from West Virginia is right, that some of that was included in that bill as it came from the House. I mention this, however, to show the amounts that have been asked for and are now pending. The total amount pending in House bill No. 3740 is $58,950. The amount asked for by this bill is $200,000, which will still leave the entire amount available for the year some $360,000 less than the amount estimated for.

I have a letter from the Public Printer, stating more in detail the necessities of the office than the brief note which I read last evening. I think it is well to place it on record. It will take but a moment to read it. It is not addressed to me, but to the chairman of the Committee on Printing, in the House. I send it to the desk to be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE PUBLIC PRINTER,
Washington, March 25, 1878.

Sir: In compliance with your request I proceed to give the reasons why a deficiency of $250,000 is asked for to pay the expenses of the Government Printing Office until the commencement of the next fiscal year.

The amount appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878,	$1,300,000 00
Appropriated December 15, 1877, for printing for United States	15,000 00
Supreme Court	26,424 78
Deposited by this office from sales of waste paper, &c.	1,341,424 78
Amount expended to March 25	1,061,277 74

Balance March 25	280,147 04
Estimated amount required to pay claims against the office to March 31 not less than	60,000 00
Estimated balance March 31	220,147 04

The expenditures for the next three months, commencing on the 1st of April, will exceed, by a large amount, any other three months of the present fiscal year, for several reasons:

First. The expense of the RECORD will increase as the session advances, because more work will be done in Congress. No one can tell when Congress will adjourn.

Second. There is now a very scant supply of the various papers used in printing for the Departments as well as for Congress on hand, and large orders must be given immediately to meet the demand of the Departments and Congress.

Third. The supply of materials for the binding is also low, and must be increased so as to bind 15,000 copies of the Revised Statutes now being printed as well as the volumes of the RECORD and other publications ordered, and to meet orders that may yet be given.

All paper and other materials ordered now must be paid for out of the appropriation for the present fiscal year.

It is possible that by deferring work that may be postponed without much detriment to the public interest until the next fiscal year, this office can make $300,000 answer.

Very respectfully yours, &c.,
JNO. D. DEFREES,
Public Printer.

Hon. O. R. SINGLETON,
House of Representatives.

Mr. WINDOM. I will add a single word. The Senate will observe by the reading of the letter from the Public Printer that the amount asked for in this deficiency was $250,000, while the bill provides but $200,000. He closes the statement, however, by saying that by postponing a portion of the work until the next fiscal year he may possibly get through with it. That seems to be the usual policy nowadays, to postpone; and the Committee on Appropriations have agreed to in this regard.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I only wish to call attention to what now appears, that a large sum of money, twenty-six and odd thousands of dollars, has been received by the Public Printer for the sale of waste material and has been used by him, expended for the use of the office. I should be glad to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether in his judgment that is according to law. There may be a statute—although my eye does not fall upon it at this moment—which authorizes the Public Printer to make these sales and to use the money instead of paying it into the Treasury. I do not see it. I do not say that it does not exist; but there is another statute of the United States which says that every officer of the United States who receives any public money into his hands from any source whatever, except from an appropriation to pay it out, shall proceed immediately to pay it into the Treasury, as he ought to do.

Now I should be glad to know by what authority of law it is that the Public Printer sells what is called waste material of all sorts in large amounts, and then proceeds to expend the money obtained for that for the uses of the office. If it is the law, it ought to be corrected, because in every branch of the Government (unless some one has been omitted by accident or mistake) it has been hitherto provided that every sum of money that comes into the hand of every officer in the Army or anywhere else from the sale of property of the United States shall be paid into the Treasury, as it ought to be, and that enables us to know what becomes of this property and enables us to know what actually the public service costs in each Department.

I should be glad to have my honorable friend inform us what he understands to be the present state of the law on that subject as applied to the Public Printing Office.

Mr. WINDOM. I stated to the Senator a moment ago that my attention was first called to this item within the last ten or fifteen minutes. I have not examined the question and cannot give him the authority, if any exists, for the application of this fund. I had supposed, as he says, that the law required the proceeds of all sales of public property to be turned into the Treasury. I still know no reason why that is not the law, and am surprised to find this item in the account; but finding it there, and made by so reliable a gentleman as the Public Printer, I am inclined to think he must have some authority for it, and the Senator will have either to get a postponement of this bill or make inquiry into the statutes; I cannot give him the authority for it.

Mr. BECK. I would ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if it would not be well, in view of the question which has been asked by the Senator from Vermont and the importance of knowing the facts relative to it, to have the bill recommitted to our committee, and the Public Printer can be sent for by to-morrow morning and all the facts ascertained. I am not able to answer the question put; and the chairman does not seem to be. I believe the law requires all money received from sales of public property to be paid into the Treasury. It is a mistake, if it does not. By to-morrow morning we can give all the information desired. I think we had better pursue that course perhaps.

Mr. WINDOM. I think very possibly we may get the information here and avoid the delay.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Revised Statutes, section 3818, provide:

The moneys received from sales of extra copies of documents, and from sales of paper-shavings and imperfections, shall be deposited by the Congressional Printer in the Treasury of the United States, to the credit of the appropriations for public printing, binding, and paper, respectively, as designated by him, and shall be subject to his requisition in the manner prescribed by law.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I like the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky. It will only cause a delay of one day, if any delay at all. I think the information asked for by the Senator from Vermont is proper. I agree with him and with the others who have spoken, that the law now requires that all receipts from the sale of any kind of materials shall be paid into the Treasury, and not taken out without an appropriation. I think it would be well for the Committee on Appropriations to ascertain all the facts. There may be other things than those which have been stated. I suggest to the Senator from Minnesota, the chairman of the committee, that it would be better to have the Public Printer before the committee to-morrow, and we can ascertain the fact here brought in question with one or two other facts that I have in my mind which it is unnecessary to go into here at present.

Mr. WINDOM. I think there is no necessity for that so far as this fact is concerned. If the Senator will give me his attention, I can convince him, I think, of that. If he has any other reasons, of course I cannot answer as to them. The statute read by the Senator from Rhode Island says:

The moneys received from sales of extra copies of documents and from sales of paper-shavings and imperfections shall be deposited by the Congressional Printer in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the appropriations for public printing, binding, and paper, respectively, as designated by him, and shall be subject to his requisition in the manner prescribed by law.

His letter uses this language: "Deposited by this office from sales of waste-paper," which, I think, clearly means that he has deposited according to law. Certainly there is no indication that he has not. I would be entirely willing that the bill should go over were it not that there is a very great necessity for money there, as I understand. The letter that I have been quoting from at some length is dated March 25, a somewhat old document, that I received when I sent over to the House for further information with reference to this appropriation; but the note of April 20, 1878, addressed to me, reads as follows:

Sir: The House passed a bill yesterday providing for a deficiency for public printing, binding, &c. Will you please urge its passage by the Senate at once? as I cannot even order paper on which your bills are printed until passed.

Very respectfully yours,

J. D. DEFREES,
Public Printer.

The letter now in the hands of the Senator from Vermont is a month old. This letter was written on the 20th of the present month, and the necessity is very much more pressing now of course than it was at that time. If any Senator has any doubt about the necessity for this, of course the bill ought to lie over; but I think it will be better to let it lie over until some time in the afternoon when the committee can consult upon any point they desire with the Public Printer and avoid the postponement of two days. If it goes over to to-morrow, a single objection will then carry it over to a second day. The Public Printer, I will say, can be brought here in fifteen minutes, and the committee can consult with him and give any information the Senate may desire.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The statute which the Senator from Rhode Island has said applies to moneys derived from the sales "of paper-shavings and imperfections," by which I suppose is meant prints that are not perfect, where the type has become irregular, or there is a blot, or whatever it may be; that is to be deposited. Now the Public Printer says "amount deposited by this office from sales of waste-paper, &c., $26,424.78."

That is a very large sum from "paper-shavings and imperfections"—very large indeed. I do not by this mean to say that I doubt at all the propriety of the Printer paying into the Treasury everything that he gets from the sale of any waste material. There may be an old printing-press that is no longer of any use to him. It may be that the law authorizes him to sell it; I think it ought to; and I assume that it does; but if it does, there is a statute, to which I referred, that says he shall pay that money into the Treasury; but this statute does not say he can take it out again. The only money that he can take out again is the money from "paper-shavings and imperfections"—two particular descriptions.

Now, I should be glad to know (without meaning by this inquiry to impute the slightest want of diligence to the Printer) exactly how that thing is done, and how that item of $26,000 is made up, so as to know for the future whether he is drawing upon the public funds under this section of the statute upon money derived from some other source than that which the statute authorizes him to draw upon. The bill being laid over for a little while will undoubtedly meet the purpose.

Mr. WINDOM. I am entirely willing that the bill shall be laid aside for the present, and we will get the information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside temporarily and the Senate will proceed with the Calendar.

Mr. WINDOM. If Senators are not satisfied when the Public Printer is heard from, the bill can be laid over until to-morrow. Is that satisfactory to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I am satisfied. I think well of the suggestion of the chairman to make the inquiry now or at any time he can.

Mr. BECK. I suppose we can do it in half an hour.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very likely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside for the present and the consideration of the Calendar resumed.

Several SENATORS. All right.

CHINESE INDEMNITY FUND.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next bill on the Calendar in order is the bill (H. R. No. 923) supplementary to the act entitled "An act to carry into effect the convention between the United States and China concluded on the 8th day of November, 1858, at Shanghai," approved March 3, 1859, and to give the Court of Claims jurisdiction in certain cases.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

DWIGHT W. HAKES.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 644) for the relief of Dwight W. Hakes; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to settle with Dwight W. Hakes, first lieutenant and regimental quartermaster of the Eighteenth Regiment Connecticut Volunteer Infantry, who was taken prisoner of war at the battle of Winchester, Virginia, June 14, 1863, and lost all his books, papers, funds, and vouchers, which fell into the hands of the enemy, upon such evidence as he may be able to offer and upon his own depositions, when no better evidence can be produced.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. PLUMB on the 26th of March:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the accompanying bill (S. No. 64) for the relief of Dwight W. Hakes, respectfully submit the following report:

The said Dwight W. Hakes was, on the 18th day of June, 1863, in the military service of the United States as first lieutenant and regimental quartermaster of the Eighteenth Regiment Connecticut Volunteers. On said date he was taken prisoner by the confederate forces, having on his person certain vouchers for subsistence stores issued by him, which vouchers were then and there lost by reason of such capture. Lieutenant Hakes remained a prisoner for about twenty months. On his return to duty he found charged to him the sum of $145.46, on account, as he alleges, of supplies issued by him and covered by the vouchers so as aforesaid lost. As the vouchers were never recovered and as, by lapse of time, other conclusive proofs could not be furnished by Lieutenant Hakes to show the proper issue of the supplies covered by this charge, he has never been able to settle his accounts and obtain the certificate of non-indebtedness necessary to enable him to draw his pay. The Commissary-General of Subsistence, referring to this bill, says: "From the affidavit of Lieutenant Hakes, I am of the opinion that it would be a matter of justice to pass the accompanying bill, S. No. 644, Forty-fifth Congress, second session." The Secretary of War also recommends the passage of the bill.

The affidavit of Lieutenant Hakes, with the corroborating circumstances, seems to show to a reasonable certainty the loss of the vouchers mentioned. This, coupled with the recommendation of the Commissary-General and the Secretary of War, seems to be sufficient to warrant the passage of the bill, which the committee therefore recommends.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I had the impression that there was a statute now which authorized the accounting officers to adjust accounts where vouchers were lost. I do not see in his seat the Senator who has charge of the bill. The case as stated is apparently a very meritorious one, but I dislike very much to set the precedent of authorizing an accounting officer at the War Department to settle an account on the affidavit of the person to whom the property has been intrusted. I should much prefer to avoid such a precedent and to simply provide that the proper officers of the proper Department may in their discretion, and upon such evidence as is satisfactory to them, settle these accounts. If in this instance, although it is a very small one and apparently a very proper one as far as we can judge, we say that the affidavit of the party concerned himself as to the loss of vouchers shall be sufficient evidence on which to relieve him from responsibility, then we have established a principle which would apply to all other cases of persons who were not in bad repute; that is, that a person who is bound to account for public property may be authorized by law and ought to be authorized by law to discharge himself on his own affidavit. Now, if we are satisfied from the general circumstances and the opinion of the Secretary of War, &c., that in this little matter this gentleman ought to be relieved, as I see no reason to doubt that he ought, I think it would be better to say in the statute either absolutely that he is relieved, or without saying that his affidavit shall be taken to say that the Department may receive such information as they believe, whatever it may be, is correct.

I only make this suggestion; I do not wish to interfere with the Military Committee; but to lay down the proposition on ever so small a case that a person who is bound to account for public property or public money may discharge himself on his own affidavit is rather a dangerous step to take.

Mr. BURNside. I suggest, as the Senator from Kansas who has charge of the bill [Mr. PLUMB] is not present and it is not a matter of sufficient magnitude to have made any impression on the other members of the committee—I have an indistinct recollection of it—it be passed over.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is a very small matter, and this poor fellow very likely ought to be relieved, so let the bill be laid aside temporarily.

Mr. BURNside. That will do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside temporarily.

DEPOSITS FOR LAND SURVEYS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 801) to amend section 2403 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to deposits for surveys.

Mr. BURNside. The Senator from Kansas who has charge of this bill [Mr. PLUMB] is absent. I suggest that it also go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. SARGENT. Has the Senator from Rhode Island any objection to the bill being read? My opinion is that it is an important bill.

Mr. BURNside. No objection whatever.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Committee on Public Lands report an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and in lieu to insert:

That section 2403 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"Sec. 2403. Where settlers make deposits in accordance with the provisions of section 2401, the amount so deposited shall go in part payment for their lands situated in the townships the surveying of which is paid for out of such deposits: or the certificates issued for such deposits may be assigned by indorsement, and be received in payment for any public lands of the United States entered by settlers under the pre-emption and homestead laws of the United States, and not otherwise."

Mr. SARGENT. I think the Senator will see no objection to that bill.

Mr. BURNside. I have no objection to it.

Mr. PADDOCK. This bill was reported by the Senator from Kansas who is now not in his seat, and I suggest that the bill go over.

Mr. SARGENT. Nevertheless it is a bill very well understood by Senators who know anything about the deposits for surveys of the public lands.

Mr. PADDOCK. I have no objection to the bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is a matter of a good deal of importance to all the western country.

Mr. SARGENT. The privilege exists by law, on account of the inadequate appropriations made for public surveys, to the settlers in any township to have the township surveyed, to advance the money which is put into the hands of the United States surveyor-general, and they are credited with it in the purchase of their lands. This bill simply perfects the machinery.

Mr. PADDOCK. I understand the bill myself. I did not know but that it might be necessary to have an explanation from the Senator who reported the bill. It is all right, I think.

The bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

H. A. MYERS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 260) for the relief of H. A. Myers; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to H. A. Myers, late a private Eleventh Kansas Volunteers, of a sum that shall be equal to the pay of a private soldier from the 17th day of September, 1862, to the date of his discharge from the service of the United States, deducting therefrom any amount that may have been paid to him as such private soldier.

The Committee on Military Affairs reported an amendment to add to the bill the words "and any amount that may be due from him to the Government."

Mr. BURNside. There is a written report in that case which can be read if desired.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear it.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. BURNside on the 26th of March:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 260) for the relief of H. A. Myers, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

I suggest that the bill for the relief of H. A. Myers be recommended favorably, and refer for my reasons to the report of the Adjutant-General, attached hereto, which I desire to make a part of my report:

ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
March 15, 1878.

Respectfully returned to the Secretary of War.

It appears from the records of this office that Hiram A. Myers was enrolled September 17, 1862, and mustered into service from that date as private Company D, Eleventh Kansas Cavalry, and served honorably from date of enrollment to July 7, 1864. On the muster-out roll of company, dated September 13, 1865, he is reported as follows:

"This man enlisted in good faith, served faithfully as a soldier from enlistment to July 7, 1864; his old enlistment papers were lost, new ones were made out, and upon examination he was rejected by T. Sinka, surgeon board examiners, district Northern Kansas, July 7, 1864, when he was dropped from company rolls."

"There is due him for use and risk of horse and equipments from date of last payment to June 20, 1864, and he is indebted to the United States for horse equipments $31. He was last paid by Major Bowen to February 29, 1864."

There would appear to be no objection to this bill becoming a law.

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Adjutant-General.

It is clear, in view of this report, that the bill should pass.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM BOWLIN.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 334) for the relief of William Bowlin, late of Company L, Second Arkansas Cavalry; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out in lines 7 and 8 the words "10th of October, 1863," and to insert "13th of February, 1864;" so as to make the bill read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to pay to William Bowlin, late of Company L, Second Arkansas Cavalry, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sum equal to the pay and emoluments of a captain of cavalry, from the 13th of February, 1864, to the 8th of March, 1864, deducting whatever pay he may have received for that period as an enlisted man.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLAIMS FOR STORES AND SUPPLIES.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3068) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the bill, and the amendments will be acted upon as reached.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I should prefer to wait until the chairman of the Committee on Claims comes in, who has the bill in charge, so that he can explain the amendments if necessary. I do not wish to ask that the bill go over because undoubtedly almost all these matters are meritorious things. Let the Clerk read through the bill and then let us take up the amendments afterward.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That course will be pursued.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments of the committee will now be reported and acted upon.

The first amendment was, in the name of John R. Shackleford, line 111, to strike out "R" and insert "K."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill by striking out the word "allowed" in line 9 and inserting in lieu thereof the words "passed upon;" so as to read:

And the receipt of the same to be taken and accepted in each case as a full and final discharge of the several claims examined and passed upon by the proper accounting officers.

That is necessary to render the bill sensible.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN. In line 317, I move to insert the word "dollars" after the word "twenty-five;" so as to read:

David H. Dickey, Monroe County, $725.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN. Those are all the amendments I wish made to the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ROLLIN J. REEVES.

Mr. McMILLAN. Before proceeding with the Calendar again I desire, from the Committee on Claims, to report back the bill (S. No. 366) for the relief of Rollin J. Reeves, which was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs and referred to the Committee on Claims. I move that the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the claim. This motion is made at the request of the claimant and for his convenience, that he may proceed with his claim before the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

DWIGHT W. HAKES.

Mr. PLUMB. I have been informed that during my absence the bill (S. No. 644) for the relief of Dwight W. Hakes was temporarily laid aside. If so, I ask that it be now considered.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ROLLINS in the chair.) The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] proposed to amend the bill. The proposed amendment will be read by the Secretary.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lines 10, 11, and 12 it is proposed to strike out the words "evidence as he may be able to offer and upon his own depositions, when no better evidence can be produced," and insert "evidence or information as shall satisfy them that his claim is just;" so as to make the bill read:

That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury of the United States be, and hereby are, authorized to settle with Dwight W. Hakes, first lieutenant and regimental quartermaster of the Eighteenth Regiment Connecticut Volunteer Infantry, who was taken prisoner of war at the battle of Winchester, Virginia, June 14, 1863, and lost all his books, papers, funds, and vouchers, which fell into the hands of the enemy, upon such evidence or information as shall satisfy them that his claim is just.

Mr. PLUMB. I accept the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PHOEBE HENRIETTA GROESBECK.

The bill (S. No. 342) for the relief of Phoebe Henrietta Groesbeck was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Phoebe Henrietta Groesbeck, of San Antonio, Texas, $300, being the amount due her for rent of property occupied under contract by the United States, and for which a proper voucher, now on file in the Treasury Department, was given.

Mr. MORRILL. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the report is called for.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. HARRIS March 27:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 342) for the relief of Phoebe Henrietta Groesbeck, submit the following report:

That this claim is based upon a voucher issued by W. H. Brown, captain and assistant quartermaster of the United States Army, to the claimant (in the name of Henrietta Groesbeck) in September, 1865—

"For rent of one building at San Antonio, used for the headquarters and offices of the commander of the post at San Antonio from August 1 to September 30, 1865, two months, at $150 per month, $300."

To which is added the following:

"I certify that the above account is correct and just; that the services were rendered as stated; that they were necessary for the public service, and that the services have been reported by me according to the Army regulations, as per my report of persons, &c., for the month of September, 1865."

"W. H. BROWN,
Captain, Assistant Quartermaster."

This voucher was presented to the Quartermaster-General, who, on the 15th February, 1872, referred it to the Third Auditor of the Treasury, who, on the 25th March, 1872, rejected the claim, as follows:

"The claim, having originated in an insurrectionary district during the late war of the rebellion, is barred from settlement by act of Congress of February 21, 1867. It is therefore disallowed."

The committee, being of opinion that the claim is just and should be paid, report the bill back, with the recommendation that it pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

M. S. DRAUGHN.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 471) for the relief of M. S. Draughn; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to M. S. Draughn, of Tennessee, his heirs or legal representatives, $60, in full of property rented from him and occupied under contract, and for which rent vouchers now on file in the Treasury Department were given.

Mr. HARRIS. That is exactly the same character of case as the one preceding it, which has just been acted upon; it stands upon the same character of vouchers.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILL R. HERVEY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1224) for the relief of Will R. Hervey; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay Will R. Hervey, of Louisville, Kentucky, $3,639.25, in full satisfaction of loss occurring to him by the payment of a forged check, as cashier of the United States Depository at Louisville, Kentucky.

Mr. MORRILL. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. COCKRELL March 27:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1224) for the relief of Will R. Hervey, have fully considered the same, and submit the following report:

This bill appropriates to claimant the sum of $3,639.25, the amount of a forged draft, purporting to be drawn by H. C. Ransom, brevet lieutenant-colonel, chief quartermaster, Department of the Cumberland, and also depot quartermaster at Louisville, Kentucky, dated at Louisville, February 2, 1870, payable to Albert Fink, or bearer, and drawn on the depository of the United States at Louisville, Kentucky.

Claimant, Will R. Hervey, was cashier, and was appointed March 15, 1865, and served to June 30, 1874, when the depository was removed.

Claimant bases his rights upon certain alleged facts, to wit, that said check was upon the usual blanks furnished disbursing officers to be used in drawing money from said depository, and that it was payable to Mr. Fink, or bearer, and that Mr. Fink was a gentleman of business, to whom such checks were being given by disbursing officers, and that the signature to the same was such a perfect imitation of the genuine handwriting and signature of Colonel Ransom that he, as such cashier, by the exercise of due diligence and care, and without fault or neglect, failed to discover the forgery, and therefore paid it in the usual course of business, and after the forgery was discovered paid this said depository the said sum and used all possible means of tracing the forgery.

To sustain these allegations claimant produces the affidavit of the depository at the time, James P. Luse, as follows, to wit:

This affiant states that he is United States depository at Louisville, Kentucky; that a check, purporting to be drawn by H. C. Ransom, brevet lieutenant-colonel and quartermaster, on duty in Louisville, for $3,639.25, was paid by Will R. Hervey, cashier, on the 2d day of February, 1870, which afterward proved to be a forgery; and, as soon thereafter as said Hervey could arrange to do so, he paid the full amount into the depository. He knows personally that said Hervey made every effort to discover the forgery, and has not yet remitted his efforts; but up to this time they have been unavailing. That, upon a rigid scrutiny of said check and a careful comparison of it with other checks of said Ransom known to be genuine, he found the imitation so perfect as almost to defy detection. He says that said Hervey has been cashier for a number of years, for the last four of which under affiant, and during that time has discharged his duties faithfully, devoting himself to his business and exercising all the care and attention which any could.

In testimony whereof the affiant has hereunto subscribed his name and made oath thereto, January 7, 1873.

JAMES P. LUSE,

United States Depository.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 7th day of January, 1873.

JNO. T. MCQUIDDY,

Notary Public, Jefferson County, Kentucky.

Also the affidavit of A. Hoagland, special agent of the Government:

I do hereby certify that, in February, 1870, and for some time subsequent thereto, I was a special agent of the Treasury Department, my business being to detect frauds upon the Government, particularly in the Internal Revenue Department, by counterfeiting stamps and otherwise; that at the request of Mr. Luse, surveyor, and Mr. Hervey, cashier United States depository, and by the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, I endeavored to discover the person or persons engaged in the forgery of a check purporting to be drawn by Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel H. C. Ransom, quartermaster, for $3,639.25 on the United States depository, and which was paid by Mr. Hervey. I labored earnestly in this matter, with the assistance of Mr. Luse and Mr. Hervey, but could not obtain sufficient proof to fasten the charge upon any one, although I found enough to fix a strong suspicion upon some parties. It was the best executed forgery I ever saw, and from the nature of my business and long practice therein I consider myself an expert. The check used was taken from a book furnished by the Department for the use of disbursing officers. I satisfied myself that it did not come out of Colonel Ransom's book, but from that of another disbursing officer who occupied an apartment in the same building. The filling up and the signature were perfect imitations of Colonel Ransom's handwriting, and well calculated to deceive any one, even on close inspection; and several persons familiar with Colonel Ransom's writing expressed to me the same opinion.

A. HOAGLAND.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 20th day of January, 1873.

W. A. MEREDITH,

United States Commissioner.

Also the affidavit of Walworth Jenkins, chief of police of the city of Louisville, Kentucky, and in February 1870, chief clerk to Colonel Ransom, to wit:

STATE OF KENTUCKY,
Jefferson County, et c:

Personally appeared before the undersigned, a duly-commissioned notary public in and for said State and county, Walworth Jenkins, of Louisville, Kentucky, who, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he is chief of police of the city of Louisville, Kentucky, and was formerly a captain and assistant quartermaster United States Army, and in February, 1870, was chief clerk in the office of the chief quartermaster of the Department of the Cumberland, then in charge of Bt. Lieut. Col. H. C. Ransom, quartermaster United States Army; that said Colonel Ransom was also depot quartermaster in said — and had two offices and sets of employes as chief and depot quartermaster; that affiant has known said Ransom for over twenty years, and is familiar with the handwriting of said Ransom; that he has frequently seen and examined a certain check, dated February 2, 1870, in favor of Albert Fink, for $3,639.25, or thereabouts, purporting to be drawn on designated depository of the United States, at Louisville, Kentucky, by H. C. Ransom, brevet lieutenant-colonel and chief quartermaster, Department of the Cumberland, and paid at said depository by William R. Hervey, cashier of said depository; that the filling up and signature of said check are so well executed, and so similar to the handwriting of said Colonel Ransom that a close examination would not, in his opinion, detect a forgery. To all letters and official papers relating to the business of Colonel Ransom, as chief quartermaster of the department, the signature invariably was "H. C. Ransom, Bt. Lt. Col. & C. Qm. D. C.," and to all checks and papers relating to his business as depot quartermaster, the signature was "H. C. Ransom, Bt. Lt. Col. Qm.," the official designation being written below his name. This check was signed in the former manner, and I have compared the signature with his signature to letters in the copying-book, placing the letter over the check and the signatures in several cases fitted so closely that I was satisfied the forgery was done by tracing a genuine signature. I have always believed that the filling up and signature of the check were either original or traced from some of Colonel Ransom's original writing.

W. JENKINS,

Chief Police, Louisville, Kentucky.

Sworn and subscribed before me, this 8th day of January, 1873.

JAS. C. MONES,

Notary Public, Jefferson County, Kentucky.

Numerous witnesses testify to the high character and standing of Mr. Hervey, his close attention to business, and his great care, prudence, and diligence.

Your committee addressed a letter of inquiry to the Secretary of the Treasury, and received the following answer, to wit:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 25, 1878.

Sir: Referring to your letter of the 15th instant and your conversation of the 23d instant with the chief clerk of this Department, relative to House bill No. 1294, for the relief of Will R. Hervey, late cashier of the United States depository at Louisville, Kentucky, for having paid a check purporting to be drawn by Colonel Ransom upon that office February 2, 1870, in favor of Albert Fink, or bearer, for $3,639.25, alleged to be a forgery, I have the honor to inform you that it appears from the records of this Department that Will R. Hervey was appointed in the office of the United States depository at Louisville, March 15, 1865, and that he remained in the office until it was abolished on June 30, 1874.

The blanks for checks drawn upon that office by all officers were furnished by the Department, and were uniform in design and color, and the check in question appears to have been drawn upon one of the usual blanks.

An examination of the paid checks of the depository in question on file in this Department shows that frequently large amounts were paid upon checks drawn to bearer without indorsement, and that the serial numbers of checks were frequently changed by the drawers.

At the time the depository was abolished the amount of public money turned over was found to be correct.

From July 1, 1865, to June 30, 1874, the office in which Mr. Hervey was cashier received about $64,000,000 and disbursed about $63,000,000.

The copy of the report of balances, herewith inclosed, shows the number of accounts, and to whom the money belonged on February 5, 1870, the date of the report nearest that of the alleged fraudulent check, from which it will be seen that the office had open accounts with forty-two disbursing officers.

The check in question inclosed in your letter is herewith returned as you request.

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary.

Hon. F. M. COCKRELL,
United States Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL, for the committee, made a comparison of the forged check with genuine checks drawn by Colonel Ransom about the same time, and found the signature to the forged check an almost perfect imitation of the genuine signature, not only in general appearance, but also in the smallest minutiae and forms of the letters, &c. On February 5, 1870, according to the statement sent with letter of Secretary, there was on deposit at said depository in Louisville, the sum of $631,751.84 in the names of some forty-two different depositories.

Your committee believe from the evidence that Mr. Hervey was attentive, diligent, and careful, and without fault, neglect, or want of care paid this forged check, honestly believing it genuine, and that the resemblance of the forged signature to the genuine was so very great and perfect that no business examination would detect the forgery, and that, as a matter of equity and fair dealing, the Government should refund the said principal sum to him.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of said House bill, reported back without amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. This is a very dangerous precedent to set. Mr. COCKRELL. I will state to the Senator from Illinois that this is not a precedent. This is simply following what the Senate has done in more than fifty cases. Instead of establishing a precedent, it is rather following the rules and precedents which have heretofore been established. I made the report, and I confess very frankly that when I started into the investigation I did it for the purpose of killing the bill if it were possible. If I could have found any reasonable or just ground upon which I could have based an adverse report, I should have reported adversely upon it with a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The objection I have to it is that no person ought to be relieved for paying a forged check, and the many officers of this Government who are charged with money should suffer the same as men suffer in private life. I do not see any difference between the two cases. I think it opens very widely the door to applications of this kind.

Mr. MORRILL. And prevents watchfulness.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. And prevents watchfulness on the part of the public depositories. I do not know when the precedent was set, but whenever it was set it was a very bad one.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. MORRILL. I think we had better have the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. There is no use of the yeas and nays.

Mr. MORRILL. I would rather take the question by rising. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Those who favor the passage of the bill will rise and stand until counted.

Mr. HARRIS. I thought the yeas and nays were demanded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The demand was withdrawn.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not want to break up a quorum, but I am not satisfied that this bill should pass unless a majority of the Senate are in favor of it, and I would rather let it go over until a majority is in the Senate, and then it may be taken up and I will ask for the yeas and nays upon its passage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I call for the yeas and nays if a vote is insisted upon, but I am willing the bill should be passed over.

Mr. SARGENT. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not understand the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. This bill was reported by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL.] There are a number of Senators on this side who were not present when the report was read and they desire that the Senator who reported the bill should make a statement in regard to the claim.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. Hervey was the cashier of the United States depository then located at Louisville, Kentucky, and he had charge of it from the time it was first established until it was removed; I have forgotten the exact dates; but during that time he received about $64,000,000 of public funds and disbursed about $63,000,000. These disbursements were made upon drafts or checks drawn by the United States disbursing officers upon the United States depository at Lexington. He paid and accounted for every dollar of funds that came into his hands. In 1870 a forged draft or check was presented for the amount of this bill, $3,639.25. He paid that check.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. It was a check purporting to be drawn by whom?

Mr. COCKRELL. It was a check purporting to be drawn by Lieutenant-Colonel Ransom, a disbursing officer of the United States in that department, and the check purported to be payable to a gentleman by the name of Albert Fink, who was the superintendent or person in charge of the railroad from Louisville to Nashville, and in whose favor large drafts or checks were constantly being drawn by the different disbursing officers of the United States there. The check was drawn upon one of the printed embellished blanks of the Treasury Department, the blanks that are sent out, almost like a bank bill; and there was nothing upon the face of the draft or check which would lead any prudent, discreet, judicious man to suspect that it was a forgery. I sent to the Treasury Department and had the chief clerk bring to my room some thirty or forty of the original checks drawn by Colonel Ransom, just before and just after the payment of this forged check or draft. I compared the handwriting of the genuine draft with the handwriting of the forged draft, and I say it would take an exceedingly accurate expert to distinguish the difference between the signatures. There was but one point that I thought might have attracted his attention, and that was the number of the draft. I went so far as to compare the drafts. The Treasury Department assured me that there was no regularity in the numbering of the drafts which were drawn upon the United States depository there, that some officers would number them by months and some would number them by years, and some by shorter periods; that some would number them by a book; so that there was nothing in this forged draft which presented anything to give Mr. Hervey a clue to the forgery. As the report states, he paid it with the exercise of the utmost care, with the exercise of the utmost diligence, and no laches, no fault, no blame can attach to him. If he were the cashier of a private bank, or if he were the cashier of a corporate bank, I guarantee that there is not one in the United States that would undertake to hold him responsible for having paid such a draft or check as that out of the funds of the bank.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. HOWE. Was the depository a bank or not?

Mr. COCKRELL. It was a United States depository where large amounts of funds were deposited to be paid out to the various departments there.

Mr. HOWE. Was this check presented by a stranger to the depository?

Mr. COCKRELL. These checks had printed upon their face, "payable to" a certain person "or bearer."

Mr. HOWE. Very well.

Mr. COCKRELL. It was presented as other checks were being presented daily. They do not know by whom it was presented.

Mr. HOWE. He paid it, then, to a stranger?

Mr. COCKRELL. He paid it just as he paid all checks to the bearer and this was the only forged check that was ever presented. After that they changed the system. The blanks were printed here at the Treasury Department, being regular printed drafts and they had in print the words "or bearer," and never until after that did they change the drafts by substituting the words "or order."

Mr. HOWE. Is it the habit of depositaries or cashiers of banks to pay checks to strangers?

Mr. COCKRELL. It is where the check is made payable "to bearer." That was the universal rule there, and they paid out $63,000,000 in the same way. Checks were drawn by quartermasters, by commissaries, and by paymasters for persons doing labor here and there in the various Departments, and they were payable to a certain person "or bearer," and were paid to the person who presented them at the depository.

Mr. HOWE. Is the Senator quite sure that he can get a check payable to bearer cashed at a bank in New York, where he is a stranger?

Mr. COCKRELL. I am not familiar with the rules there. I am not saying anything about that. I only say what was the rule here and what is the rule in the country banks, so far as I know—I do not know about the large city banks—that where a check or draft is payable "to bearer" whoever presents it gets the money, unless there is some suspicion to show that the man did not rightfully come by the check, or something of that kind. Mr. Fink was superintendent of the railroad and large checks or drafts were drawn in his favor. It is not known at the Treasury that he ever presented one of these drafts in his life in person. He was the superintendent, and they were drawn to him and presented by his clerk or employes in the office of the railroad company.

Mr. SARGENT. Is it not the rule of all banking institutions that where an instrument is drawn payable "to bearer" it is paid to the person presenting it without identification?

Mr. EATON. It is, if the signature is right. That is the only thing the cashier examines in such a case. He is to see that the signature is genuine.

Mr. COCKRELL. The signature to the draft or check?

Mr. EATON. Yes.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not know what the rule is in New York but the rule all over the West is as I state it.

Mr. SARGENT. Is it not also the general rule or instruction of the Treasury Department that instruments of that kind shall be drawn to bearer?

Mr. COCKRELL. It was the rule up to that time.

Mr. SARGENT. Is it not now?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not know how it is now. I understand that they changed the form, at least at that office, and made the drafts payable "to order."

Mr. SARGENT. My impression is that it is the rule of the Treasury Department now that an instrument shall be drawn to bearer on account of the great difficulty or trouble there is in reference to identification.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am not aware of that, but as I understand they changed the form at this office.

Mr. McMILLAN. In examining this claim the ground upon which it was allowed was that there was no negligence that could be imputed to the person who paid this draft. In all claims of this kind, if there is any ground which we regard as negligence at all in the party, that is always regarded as a sufficient ground for rejecting the claim. Whatever may be the judgment of the Senate in regard to the principle involved in the matter, that is the ground on which the claim rests.

Mr. MORRILL. I suppose that if any Senator here had a deposit in a bank he would hardly feel under any obligation to pay any forged checks that might be presented against him. The United States have these depositories all over the country; and if we shall set the example of liberating every person who shall take a forged check, I am very sure that there will be less care and scrutiny in these payments than there has been heretofore. It has been said that this person was not guilty of any neglect. I take it that there was a very decided neglect on his part in paying this money to a person whom he did not know; and, it being a forged check, he did not exercise that care which he ought to have taken in order to ascertain that the person to whom he was paying the money was a responsible party; and if he had exercised the proper care, the forged check might have been recovered from him if paid. Under these circumstances I do not see how it is possible for me to vote for this bill.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I differ somewhat with the Senator from Vermont in that respect. A check that is payable to bearer I think does not impose the duty of inquiring whether the person is a responsible party or not, unless there is some suspicious circumstance to call the cashier's attention to him, and I think it is found there was none in this case. I think the holder of such a check has the legal right to payment if it is a genuine check.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the passage of the bill, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 31, nays 11; as follows:

GEORGE M. HAZEN.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 1000) for the relief of George M. Hazen; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to George M. Hazen, of Tennessee, $175, in full settlement of his account for rent at Knoxville, Tennessee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. TELLER March 27:

The Committee on Claims, to whom were referred the petition and accompanying papers of George M. Hazen, of Tennessee, have had the same under consideration, and make this report:

This claim of G. M. Hazen is for rent of building for officers and a stable in Knoxville, Tennessee, from August 1, 1865, to December 15, 1865.

A voucher was given Hazen for $175 by the captain and assistant quartermaster, and the voucher was approved by command of Major-General Stoneman. It was reported to the office of the Quartermaster-General at Washington, and it appears that the contract for rent was neither allowed nor disallowed. The premises having been occupied under a contract made by the assistant quartermaster, and duly reported to the department at Washington, and not having been disapproved, and the account and renting having been approved by General Stoneman, the committee think the claim should be allowed, and therefore report the accompanying bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I must ask that the bill go over, in order that we may see what this voucher is. If there was a written contract in advance, it is one thing; but if it was an occupation and an implied contract, of course it might be quite a different thing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill will go over.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to say to the Senator from Vermont, if he will withdraw his objection, that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] can inform him as to the character of the voucher now. It is simply the voucher of an assistant quartermaster, I take it for granted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont withdraw his objection?

Mr. EDMUNDS. For the time being, subject to the right to renew it.

Mr. TELLER. I will say that the case falls within the rule under which we have been allowing such claims. It was a contract made and approved by the commanding general, reported, and carried on the files without disapproval. I see no reason why the claim should not be paid. We have paid many other claims that were not as well supported.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So we have, a great many, too many other claims not as well supported as this; but I suppose we have got to stop somewhere. I do not know that this is the right place to stop, but I should like to inquire now whether this contract was implied, was not written?

Mr. TELLER. I do not recollect whether it was in writing or not, but it was certified to the Department. The voucher was approved by the commanding general, carried on the rolls of the Quartermaster's Department, as buildings on which the Government was to pay rent. The papers are clear. I do not remember whether the contract was in writing or not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Are the papers with the case?

Mr. TELLER. I suppose so. They ought to be with it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the bill go over, Mr. President, and I shall look at the papers. Of course a voucher can be given after there is an occupation, which may be called a contract; but it is not one. The mere fact that some quartermaster has given a voucher, a certificate stating that the party's property has been occupied, is not enough for my judgment in paying a southern claim. If we made an express contract after the war, or perhaps during the war, in advance, to pay a man a certain sum for the rent of his property, that of course stands upon a different ground, and it may be right to pay him; under general circumstances I should say it would be; but if you take possession of his property and occupy it, and he afterward wants a voucher to see what he can make out of it, and the voucher merely states that we have occupied that property and it is worth so much, that leaves the question entirely open as to whether he ought to be paid or not; and the exact character of the transaction, therefore, would decide as to which side of the line the case would fall. For that purpose I should like the bill to go over until we may see what the exact character of the case is.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say to the Senator from Vermont that this is a case where the Government by the assistant quartermaster made a contract to pay a certain amount of rent before they took possession of the building, and issued a voucher, and thereupon the commanding general approved the voucher, it being a proper subject for a voucher. It is not a case where property was taken possession of by the Army by virtue of the war right, but it was a contract.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill goes over under the rule.

SAMUEL H. CANFIELD.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2884) for the relief of Samuel H. Canfield, postmaster at Seymour, Connecticut, which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Canfield $352.12, for money-order funds to the amount of $158.76, and postage-stamps to the amount of $193.36, stolen from the post-office in Seymour, on the night of the 30th of March, 1874, without his fault, and for which stamps and money-order funds he has since that time fully accounted and settled with the Post-Office Department.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. BURN-SIDE March 28:

The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2884) for the relief of Samuel Canfield, postmaster at Seymour, Connecticut, having had the same under consideration, submit the following report: Samuel H. Canfield was postmaster at Seymour, Connecticut, and on the 30th day of March, 1874, a large iron safe in his office was blown open by burglars and money-orders to the amount of $158.76 and postage-stamps amounting to $193.36 were stolen therefrom. No part of this property has ever been recovered.

Investigations were made by the authorities of the Post-Office Department. Letters and reports from the special agent of the Post-Office Department, dated April 9, 1874, and from the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, dated January 23, 1875, and a second letter from the same source, dated March 1, 1876, and from the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, dated December 17, 1877, show that the amount of funds as stated in the bill is correct; that all due diligence and caution was used in the care and protection of the funds; that the accounts of Mr. Canfield have been settled with the Department, and that he was not indebted to the United States at the time of the date of the letter of the Auditor of the Treasury for more than the amount the current business of his office required.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill without amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NATIONAL SECURITY LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 694) to incorporate the National Security Life Insurance Company, of Washington, District of Columbia; which was read by its title.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The Senator who reported the bill is not here. Probably it may be of some importance, and it had better be postponed I think.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over under the rule.

DIVORCES IN THE TERRITORIES.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 242) in relation to the jurisdiction of district courts in the Territory of Utah in matters of divorce; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the respective district courts in each of the following Territories of the United States, to wit, New Mexico, Utah, Wyoming, Washington, Dakota, Idaho, and Montana, shall have exclusive original jurisdiction in all matters, proceedings, and processes relating to divorce; and all process or proceeding now pending in any of the probate courts of any of such Territories shall henceforth be transferred, entered, and have day in the district court in each of said Territories in which such probate court is situated. And all petitions, bills, processes, or other proceedings instituted in any probate court in any of such Territories, in matters of divorce, shall be transferred and returnable to, and have day in, the district court of any such Territory in which such probate court is situated, next to be holden after the day to which the same would otherwise be returnable to such probate court or subject to be proceeded with therein; and writs of error, bills of exception, or appeals shall be allowed in all cases of divorce from the final decision of such district court to the supreme court of such Territories respectively, in the same manner as in all other civil cases heard or tried in said district courts: Provided, That such appeal or writ of error shall be taken within thirty days after the date of the judgment or decree. And the judgment or decree shall have no effect to authorize either party to marry again until the expiration of said thirty days. And in case such writ of error or appeal being taken, the judgment or decree of the district court shall be subject to reversal, affirmance, or modification by the supreme court.

In the Territory of Arizona, the supreme court alone shall have jurisdiction in all matters of divorce; and all cases and matters of divorce pending and undetermined in any other court of said Territory at the time of the passage of this act, shall be transferred to and triable and determinable in said supreme court; and all process issued in any matter of divorce from any other court of said Territory, and not yet returned, shall be returned to said supreme court of said Territory.

SEC. 2. And no divorce shall be granted in any of said Territories except for the following causes, duly proved by witnesses in open court or by depositions duly taken for that purpose, namely, first, for the cause of adultery of the party defendant, and not for this cause if it shall be made to appear to the court that complainant has been guilty of the like offense; second, for impotence; third, for extreme cruelty; fourth, for willful and unjustifiable desertion for the period of at least two years; and, fifth, for habitual drunkenness. And no decree of divorce shall be rendered upon the mere default or failure of any defendant to answer or plead to the allegations of the complainant's bill or declaration. Nor shall the admission of a defendant in any form authorize a decree of divorce. Nor shall such decree in any wise be rendered unless the court shall be satisfied, upon due proof, that there is no collusion between the complainant or plaintiff and the defendant or respondent. Nor shall any divorce be granted nor a suit for divorce entertained in behalf of any complainant or plaintiff who has not, for at least one year before the institution of the suit, been an actual and bona fide resident of the Territory; nor, if the defendant is not a resident of such Territory, until a copy of the bill, petition, or declaration shall have been served upon the defendant or respondent, if his or her residence shall be known, at least three months before any such case shall be heard, and such service duly proved. If the residence of the defendant or respondent be unknown, then, upon satisfactory proof, by affidavit, of that fact, and showing also the last place of residence of such defendant or respondent known to the complainant or plaintiff, the court shall make an order for publication of notice of the pendency and object of the suit, in some newspaper in said Territory, naming it, and also in the newspaper nearest the place of the last-known residence of such defendant or respondent, at least once in each week, for twelve successive weeks prior to the time when such defendant or respondent shall be required to appear and defend. And in such case, after such publication has been duly made and proved, the court may proceed with the case as upon a personal service, except that, if such non-resident defendant or respondent shall appear, in person or by counsel, and ask to defend, at any time prior to the final judgment or decree, he or she shall be entitled to make a full defense in the cause. No person shall be allowed to appear or act as attorney for either party in a suit for divorce without first filing in court a power of attorney duly executed by such party, with due proof of such execution.

SEC. 3. All laws of any of said Territories, so far as they may be inconsistent with any of the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CHRISTIANCY, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill regulating divorces in the Territories of the United States."

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I ask leave to report back from the Committee on the Judiciary, in order that they may accompany the divorce bill just passed, certain papers containing the evidence on the subject. I ask that the committee be discharged therefrom, so that the papers may go to the House with the bill.

The committee were discharged.

ALBERT TOWLE.

The bill (S. No. 51) for the relief of Albert Towle, postmaster at Beatrice, Nebraska, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It appropriates $365 to reimburse Albert Towle, postmaster at Beatrice, Nebraska, for revenue-stamps stolen from his office at that place on the night of October 25, 1869.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. FERRY on the 2d instant:

The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 51) for the relief of Albert Towle, postmaster at Beatrice, Nebraska, respectfully report:

That on the night of the 25th of October, A. D. 1869, the post-office building at Beatrice, Nebraska, was entered by burglars, and United States revenue-stamps to the amount of $365 and other property were stolen therefrom. These facts are stated in the memorial of Albert Towle, the postmaster. The affidavits of five prominent business men of Beatrice verify the sworn statement of Postmaster Towle. It appears from the papers that the utmost diligence, faithfulness, and care had been exercised in the administration of the affairs of the office; that the said post-office was kept in a new and substantially constructed building used exclusively for such purpose; that the doors were securely locked and the windows carefully fastened; that the stamps were deposited in the drawer of a table, which was locked. It being a small office there was no safe.

It further appears that one of the windows of the office was entirely broken out in the night-time, the drawer of the table forced open, the stamps taken therefrom, and other property of much greater value stolen from other parts of the office by the burglars. It also appears that prompt and most thorough efforts were made by the petitioner for the recovery of the property and the apprehension and punishment of the thieves. A communication from the Post-Office Department, showing that Postmaster Towle had at the time of the robbery a somewhat larger amount of stamps in his possession than that named in his memorial, accompanies this report. A petition, signed by all the prominent citizens within the post-office delivery, indorsing the high character of the petitioner as a man and a public officer, is also one of the papers accompanying this report. He is still the postmaster, and has had the longest continuous service of any officer in the State of Nebraska.

In view of all the facts in the case, the committee unanimously recommend that Albert Towle, postmaster at Beatrice, Nebraska, be reimbursed for the loss of revenue-stamps to the amount of $365; and to secure that result present the accompanying bill, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. KERNAN. I desire to inquire why there has been so much delay. Has this case been presented to Congress before?

Mr. PADDOCK. The same bill has passed this body twice, but failed in the other House.

Mr. KERNAN. When was it first presented?

Mr. PADDOCK. A year before I came here. It has been twice passed since I came, but failed in the other House.

Mr. KERNAN. Why were there so many stamps in that office?

Mr. PADDOCK. I will say to the Senator that the town is a small one; Mr. Towle was an agent of the Treasury Department as well as postmaster and had charge of the internal-revenue stamps at that time which were to be disposed of as business might require.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPAYMENT OF TONNAGE TAX.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 185) to amend section 2931 of the Revised Statutes of the United States so as to allow repayment by the Secretary of the Treasury of the tonnage tax where it has been exacted in contravention of treaty provisions.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a general bill. It had better go over.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope my colleague will not object to it. I have all the papers and documents in relation to it, and I should like to say what I have to say upon it at the present time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will not object to my friend making a speech, of course; I am always glad to hear him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The objection is withdrawn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Subject to renewal.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to report an amendment to come in at the last part of the bill on page 2, striking out all after the word "nor," in line 14, and inserting what I send to the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that is an amendment to an amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. MORRILL. It is a substitute for an amendment originally reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read and the amendments stated.

The bill was read, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It declares that the provisions of section 2931, of chapter 6, title 34, of the Revised Statutes shall not apply to cases of the payment of tonnage tax on vessels where the Secretary of the Treasury shall be satisfied that the exaction of such tax was in contravention of treaty provisions; and he may draw his warrant for the refund of the tax so illegally exacted, as is provided in section 3012½ of said statutes. This act is not to be construed to authorize the refunding of any tonnage duties whatever exacted prior to the 1st day of June, 1862.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Finance was, in line 6, after "Secretary of the Treasury," to insert "and Attorney-General."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to insert at the end of the bill:

Nor shall it apply to cases of the payment of tonnage tax heretofore made on vessels other than those of the Hanseatic Republics and Sweden and Norway.

Mr. MORRILL. That amendment is for the purpose of limiting the application of the bill so that there shall not be any other claims which it is proposed to adjust than those that have come to the knowledge of the Treasury Department.

Mr. President, I desire to say that this is a bill of some little importance. It relates to a matter that has been pending before the Department of State and the Treasury Department and the Attorney-General's Office for some years. There can be no doubt in relation to the fact that these tonnage duties have been claimed from states and nations with whom we have treaties, in contravention of treaty stipulations, and even in some cases in contravention of positive law, for the law imposing duties provided for the exception of those countries with whom we had treaties. I will read a single article in relation to the matter now pending that occurs in the treaty with Belgium of July 17, 1858:

Steam-vessels of the United States and of Belgium engaged in regular navigation between the United States and Belgium shall be exempt in both countries from the payment of duties of tonnage, anchorage, buoys, and light-houses.

A similar provision exists in treaties with several other nations. With Sweden we have this article in the treaty of 1783:

The King and the United States engage mutually not to grant hereafter any particular favor to other nations in respect to commerce and navigation which shall not immediately become common to the other party, who shall enjoy the same favor freely, if the concession was freely made, or on allowing the same compensation, if the concession was conditional.

Some of these claims have been before the courts; the courts have decided in favor of them, and it was understood by the Department that the other claimants standing on the same basis should be guided by the decision of the courts. I have several communications here from the Treasury Department in relation to these claims, and I do not conceive that there is a particle of doubt that our treaties with the countries mentioned in the bill as amended have been violated, and that we are under obligations of law as well as of honor to pay back anything of this kind that has been unjustly and wrongfully demanded on the part of our custom-house officers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How many years back does this go?

Mr. MORRILL. We have limited it to 1862, and then limited it to the Hanseatic Republics, and Sweden and Norway.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has there been any diplomatic complaint from those countries?

Mr. MORRILL. Oh, yes. I have long reports here. I ask to have read the last communication from the Treasury Department, dated April 15.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, April 15, 1878.

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 8th instant transmitting for my consideration (S. No. 185) a bill to amend section 2931, Revised Statutes, so as to allow repayment by the Secretary of the Treasury of tonnage tax exacted in contravention of treaty provisions.

The bill transmitted prohibits, by an amendment added to the original proviso, the refund "of any such duties, demand for repayment of which shall not have been duly made prior to January 1, 1878." And inasmuch as it was supposed that this amendment might prevent the refunding of any but a small part of the sums referred to in the letter of this Department addressed to you on the 21st of February last, you invite my attention to a substitute proposed for the amendment in question in the words following: "Nor shall it apply to cases of the payment of tonnage tax on vessels other than those of the Hanseatic Republics, and Sweden and Norway."

In the letter of this Department of the 21st of February last, an effort was made to estimate an approximate maximum sum which might possibly be claimed under the provisions of the bill. The sum estimated for claims of the Norse American line of steamships was $6,447.60, and for the North German line $124,058.19. On careful re-examination of the reports of the collectors, made two years ago, it is found that the claim of the latter line is likely to be $130,800.09. But this Department sees no reason to review its estimate of the total amount, either of principal or interest, as likely to be claimed by the latter line under the provisions of the bill. That amount, it is believed, will not exceed $180,000, and no claims are likely to arise except under the operation of the treaty with Belgium of July 17, 1858, and of the treaty with the Hanseatic Republics of December 30, 1837, or of the treaty with Sweden of April 3, 1783, or of the treaty of Sweden and Norway of July 4, 1827. The abrogation on July 1, 1875, of the treaty with Belgium cuts off all claims that were not already valid at the last-mentioned date.

The actual claim brought before this Department by the agents of the North German Lloyd's line was for a refund of $758.40 tonnage tax taken at New York on the steamship of the same name, and for interest on that amount from August 14, 1866, to December 1, 1874, claimed to be $377.56. As these sums comprise the total amount for refund of which application has in fact been made, the operation of the existing amendment (printed in italics) will be to declare this Department from making the repayment of ought but an insignificant portion of the amount recognized to have been taken from the company in violation of law and treaty provisions. Its entire claim was not presented by the company, but that which was put forward for refund of duties exacted of the steamship New York was regarded as a test case.

You further inquire whether, if nothing be said in the act about payment of interest, this Department would pay interest on the amounts originally exacted.

I reply that the question whether interest should be paid on the original claim would depend upon the obligations of this Government under the treaty stipulations referred to, as such stipulations are ordinarily construed by the law of nations. Even if it be decided by the proper Department that the stipulations of the treaties out of which these claims arise fairly involve an obligation to pay interest, it would not follow that the power given by the act to pay the principal would carry a similar power to pay interest. But whether interest should be paid would, notwithstanding the passage of the bill, still be an open question.

You further call my attention to the fact that in a communication from Secretary Fish it is alleged that the German minister pledged himself that no claim should be made on the part of the North German Lloyd line, provided the company was thereafter relieved from payment of the tax.

In a communication to this Department of the 12th of December, 1872, the Secretary of State transmitted a copy of a confidential note of the same date addressed to him by the German minister, in which the latter gave an assurance that his government would not intervene to press the claim of the German Lloyd line, if the tonnage tax then exacted on the steamers of that line should be thereafter discontinued. An exemption was granted the line in January, 1873; but the abrogation of the Belgium treaty July 1, 1875, compelled this Department to reimpose the tax. The North German Lloyd line of steamers, therefore, had the benefit of an exemption for but little more than two years, which was equivalent to relief from two payments on each steamer of the line, amounting, in round numbers, to about $20,000. This was not such a discontinuance of the tax as was sought by the company, nor does it appear to have been such a discontinuance as was contemplated by the German minister when his assurance of non-intervention was given.

Even if the confidential note addressed to the Secretary of State is to be regarded as an official document, and of sufficient force to modify the terms of a treaty, this Government never granted such an exemption from the tax as that to which reference was made in the note. And whether the German minister may or may not properly intervene through the ordinary diplomatic channels to press the claim, cannot affect the fact that the money of which refund is demanded was taken in violation of law and in contravention of treaty stipulation; and that the exaction was an infringement of the right of German citizens.

In conclusion, I would say that as some restriction of the power of this Department to make refunds in these cases is advisable, I approve of the prohibition contained in the amendment to refund tonnage tax on other vessels than those of the Hanseatic Republics and of Sweden and Norway; but would recommend that the amendment be still further restricted, and that it be made to read as follows:

"Nor shall it apply to cases of the payment of tonnage heretofore made on vessels other than those of the Hanseatic Republics and Sweden and Norway."

I return herewith the copy of the bill transmitted with your communication.

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary.

Hon. JUSTIN S. MORRILL,

Chairman of the Committee on Finance, United States Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I dislike very much to interfere with my colleague's wishes; but this is exactly one of that class of questions that are usually disposed of by an international commission. The claims of the subjects and citizens of Sweden, Norway, and the Hanseatic Republics against the United States for illegal exactions or any other injury to their property, if they take the course that the claims of other nations take, would be the subject of diplomatic intercourse and adjustment under a commission fixed in the treaty. Now, it is proposed by this statute to confide to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury or the Attorney-General of the United States, or some one person, an unlimited draft, within certain boundaries, upon the Treasury of whatever any foreigner in these various countries chooses to claim and which he chooses to believe falls within the spirit of this statute. I doubt very much the propriety of that species of legislation.

Mr. MORRILL. I call the attention of my colleague to the phraseology of the bill. It is provided here that there shall be a repayment of the tonnage tax "where the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney-General of the United States shall be satisfied that the exaction of such tax was in contravention of treaty provisions." I desire to ask him if it is possible that he is not willing to submit this to our own Attorney-General to say whether this money has been exacted in contravention of treaty stipulations. I may say that this subject was very thoroughly and carefully considered by every member of the Committee on Finance and the bill was reported unanimously in favor of, as it has been pushed by the different Departments of the Government, the State, the Treasury, and the Attorney-General's Office.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will answer my respected colleague by saying that I am unwilling to allow the Attorney-General of the United States to take money at his pleasure and on his judgment, that has been once paid into the Treasury, and pay it back on his decision as to whether it falls on one side or the other of a line. We sometimes allow the accounting officers of the Treasury in respect of claims that are regulated and defined by law to settle them; we must; but here is an entirely different provision. You create a tribunal for this special purpose. Suppose the Attorney-General decides in favor of the Government, because these are pretty large sums, in respect of some important item of a claim; what then? Does that bind the citizen of the foreign country? Not a bit of it. The foreign government immediately makes complaint and says: "You must appoint a tribunal which we have a choice in the selection of; and the decision of your own Attorney-General and your own Secretary of the Treasury is not binding upon us in the forum of nations at all; you have not discharged your amicable duty to us as a friendly nation, and you cannot bind our citizens conclusively by refusing the payment of this money merely because two of your officers have said that it was legally paid; and we call upon you still to take the usual course among nations by creating a tribunal in the composition of which the government of Sweden and of Norway and of the Hanseatic Republics shall have a voice." So in a case of any dispute, where the decision is in favor of the Treasury, you have accomplished nothing in the diplomatic sense or in the sense of public law. Where it is against the Treasury of course the claimants will very readily take the money.

But if the Finance Committee think this is a good way to do things, I am altogether too modest to interpose my simple objection to it all alone.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEFICIENCY IN PRINTING APPROPRIATION.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask the Senate now to lay aside informally the Calendar and take up the appropriation bill that was partially disposed of this morning.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4222) to provide for a deficiency in the appropriation for the public printing and binding for the current fiscal year.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, when this bill was under consideration this morning the only question that was raised with reference to it, I believe, was as to the deposit of $26,424.78, being the proceeds of waste-paper, &c., mentioned in a letter of the Public Printer. Since the discussion occurred at that time the Committee on Appropriations has further investigated the matter, and has come to the conclusion that the account is entirely regular and in accordance with the statutes.

There are two classes of receipts. The proceeds of all property, except the items named in section 3818 of the Revised Statutes, are turned into the Treasury and cannot be drawn upon except by an appropriation from Congress; but the receipts from the sales of "extra copies of documents," sales of "paper-shavings and imperfections," are turned into the Treasury under that section, are credited to the amount appropriated to the appropriation for the printing, and are drawn upon by the Public Printer as any other appropriation for the purpose. The committee I think are unanimously of the belief that the proceedings are entirely regular under the law as it exists.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if any portion of this $200,000 is applicable to the use of the Patent Office and the Post-Office?

Mr. WINDOM. It is not.

Mr. ANTHONY. Those two Departments I understand are suffering and their business is suspended for want of appropriations for printing.

Mr. WINDOM. I will say to the chairman of the Committee on Printing that there is another bill pending which is now before a committee of conference, House bill No. 3740, which provides $40,000 for the Interior Department, and we have already passed $35,000 for the Post-Office Department. That was included in the bill passed this morning, I think. It is included in a bill already passed, certainly.

Mr. SARGENT. It is in a conference committee now, is it not?

Mr. WINDOM. I ought to have said with reference to the sales of paper-shavings, imperfections, &c., that the Public Printer gives notice once a year to a large number of firms, a dozen or more, who are engaged in the manufacture of paper, that bids will be received for the three classes of shavings which he has for sale. They are graded according to their value. He receives those bids, and the articles are sold to the highest bidder. For instance, the highest class sells, we are informed, for four and three-quarter cents per pound. With reference to the other two classes the Public Printer could not give us the exact facts, but they are sold for a fair price and upon public notice and public bidding.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is all this $26,000 derived from that source?

Mr. WINDOM. All derived from that source, unless there may be a few documents included in it.

Mr. SARGENT. There are a few surplus documents, which are named in the law, sold in the same way.

Mr. WINDOM. The entire proceeds come from the articles named in the section I quoted a moment ago. If a press is sold or any other article not mentioned in section 3818, the amount received is turned into the Treasury and cannot be drawn upon unless reappropriated. But as to these articles it needs no appropriation as the law now stands, as the committee believe.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN F. SUTHERLIN AND BROTHER.

Mr. VOORHEES. I report from the Committee on Finance, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 1951) for the relief of John F. Sutherlin and Brother, of Parke County, Indiana. I desire to ask the action of the Senate on it at this time. It is a bill for relief that has been agreed to by the committee, and I presume there will be no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana reports a bill from the Committee on Finance and asks for its present consideration.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If it is reported to-day, I must object.

Mr. VOORHEES. It can hardly be said to be reported to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go on the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It can be reached to-morrow on the Calendar.

Mr. VOORHEES. Well, let it go.

AMENDMENT TO THE POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. WALLACE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 4286) to establish post-roads in the several States therein named; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 24, 1878.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed, and requested the concurrence of the House in, a bill of the following title:

A bill (S. No. 238) extending the time for the construction and completion of the Northern Pacific Railroad.

DAILY HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Rules, reported back with an amendment, the following resolution:

Resolved, That for the purpose of a speedy settlement of questions of vital importance to the country this House will hereafter and until further notice meet for the transaction of business at eleven o'clock a. m. instead of twelve o'clock m. as heretofore.

The amendment was to strike out the words "hereafter and until further notice" and to insert in lieu thereof "on and after Tuesday, the 30th instant."

The question was upon agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BURCHARD. I suggest that the resolution should be modified so as to read, "during the present session," and not make it a permanent rule for the next session. I think that during the present session it would be well for the House to meet at eleven o'clock.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I have no objection to that modification and will make it by consent of the House.

There was no objection, and the resolution was modified accordingly.

Mr. O'NEILL. I would like also to suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that he add to the resolution the words "and continue in session until five o'clock in the afternoon," so as for the present at least to avoid night sessions.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The House can determine that matter each day for itself.

Mr. O'NEILL. I presume that a session from eleven o'clock in the morning until five o'clock in the afternoon would enable us to do all the business that we could do by holding two sessions a day.

Mr. SAYLER. The objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] is that it would imply that the House necessarily should adjourn at five o'clock. Now it may be that the House will want to remain in session until seven o'clock or nine o'clock, or even eleven o'clock. Certainly the House is competent to determine the length of its session each day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that there could be an agreement among members to sit until five o'clock. But as suggested by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SAYLER], the House might want to sit later than five o'clock, or it might want on some days to adjourn before that time.

Mr. O'NEILL. During a session of six hours a day we could do much more business, and do it more satisfactorily than by holding night sessions.

Mr. MILLS. We ought to have evening sessions for the consideration of the Private Calendar.

Mr. WOOD. I think it is desirable that the House should proceed to the consideration of some business.

Mr. COX, of New York. Then I call for the regular order.

Mr. WOOD. We have spent two days in proceedings highly creditable to the House, and I think we should now continue in session day and night, if necessary, in order to complete the business before us.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I call the previous question.

The previous question was ordered and the main question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment was agreed to, and the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOSEPH B. COLLINS.

Mr. LUTTRELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4552) for the relief of Joseph B. Collins; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MANAGERS OF NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. MAISH. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Military Affairs for immediate action a joint resolution to fill vacancies in the board of managers for the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which there will be opportunity for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and the House of Representatives, &c., That Colonel Leonard A. Harris, of Ohio; Richard Coulter, of Pennsylvania; and Colonel John A. Martin, of Kansas, be, and they are hereby, appointed managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, to fill the vacancies caused by the expiration on the 21st day of April of the terms of office of Louis B. Gunckel, of Ohio; James S. Negley, of Pennsylvania; and John S. Cavender, of Missouri.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this joint resolution?

Mr. FORT. I object.

Mr. MAISH. It is a unanimous-consent report from the committee, and these appointments ought to be made now.

ASSISTANT COMMISSIONER-GENERAL, FRENCH EXPOSITION.

Mr. MONROE. I ask unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs upon a little matter which must be acted upon speedily, if it is to do any good. It is simply to enable the Department of State to find a suitable person to write the great report which we all expect in regard to that exposition.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read, after which there will be opportunity for objection.

Mr. MONROE. I forward also a letter from the Secretary of State, explaining the necessity for this legislation. I ask that this letter, as well as the resolution, may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the President, in appointing an assistant commissioner-general to the international industrial exposition to be held in Paris in 1878, with the powers and duties prescribed by the second section of the joint resolution of Congress in relation to said exposition, approved December 15, 1877, may select such assistant commissioner-general from the country at large, and not be restricted in such election to States from which no one of the additional commissioners provided for in said resolution is appointed.

Mr. MONROE. I now ask that the letter of the Secretary of State may be read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this resolution?

Mr. SPARKS. I object.

GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. KNOTT. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred sundry bills in relation to the distribution of the undistributed balance of the Geneva award, have instructed me to present a report and accompanying bill, and to ask that these be printed and recommended.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 4553) to provide for the further distribution of the moneys received under the Geneva award was read a first and second time, recommended to the Committee on the Judiciary, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. KNOTT. I also ask that my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. McMAHON], have leave to submit in writing and have printed the views of the minority of the committee, and that my colleague, the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE], may have printed an amendment to the same bill.

There being no objection, leave was granted accordingly.

SUPPRESSION OF LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. BLAIR, by unanimous consent, presented the petition of Augustus Elwell, Mary A. Woodbridge, and 1,610 other citizens of the nineteenth congressional district of the State of Ohio, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry into the statistics of the liquor traffic and for an amendment to the Constitution so as to prohibit the manufacture and sale, importation, exportation, and transportation of distilled liquors, except for medicinal, mechanical, and scientific use, from and after the year 1900; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask unanimous consent that this petition be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. THOMPSON. I object.

REPORT OF BOARD OF HEALTH, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SINGLETON, from the Committee on Printing, reported back, with an amendment, the following resolution of the Senate:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring.) That 1,500 copies of the report of the board of health of the District of Columbia for the year 1877 be printed for use and distribution by said board.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

After the words "be printed" insert the following: "and bound in paper covers."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was concurred in.

Mr. SINGLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING THE REPORT OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. BALLOU, from the Committee on Printing, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the following resolution of the Senate:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring.) That 10,500 copies of the report of the Smithsonian Institution for the year 1877 be printed; 1,000 copies of which shall be for the use of the Senate; 3,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 6,500 copies for the use of the Smithsonian Institution; Provided, That the aggregate number of pages shall not exceed 500, and that there be no illustrations except those furnished by the Smithsonian Institution.

The resolution was concurred in.

Mr. BALLOU moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MORNING HOUR.

Mr. COX, of New York. I demand the regular order of business. The SPEAKER. The regular order of business being demanded, the morning hour begins at twenty-five minutes past twelve o'clock, and the call rests with the Committee of Claims.

CHARLES B. VARNEY.

Mr. DICKEY, from the same committee, reported back favorably the bill (S. No. 149) for the relief of Charles B. Varney, and asked it be now put on its passage.

Varney, of Portland, Maine, the sum of $200, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, as compensation for the use and occupancy of a certain piece of land situated in said city of Portland, belonging to said Varney, by the United States, during the years 1867, 1868, and a part of 1869.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained. The bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. CUMMINGS. There cannot be any objection to the bill, and I hope the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw the point of order. I ask the attention of the gentleman from Illinois. He does not seem to be hearing me.

Mr. REAGAN, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 3808) to establish a line of mail and emigrant steam and sail vessels between certain ports of the United States and Liberia, Africa, and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration and that the same be referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

LIGHT-HOUSE, RARITAN BAY.

Mr. ROSS, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back the bill (H. R. The motion was agreed to.

LIGHT-HOUSE, CHATHAM, MASSACHUSETTS.

FOG-WHISTLE AT POINT WILSON, WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Mr. REA, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Washington, asking an appropriation to build a fog-whistle and bell on Point Wilson in that Territory; which, with the accompanying report of the committee, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

NORTH LOUISIANA RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. REA also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 3268) to authorize the North Louisiana Railroad Company to construct a bridge over the Ouachita River at or near Monroe, Louisiana, and a bridge over the Red River at or near Shreveport, Louisiana, and asked for its present consideration by the House.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the North Louisiana Railroad Company, a corporation of the State of Louisiana, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct a bridge over the Ouachita River at or near Monroe, in the State of Louisiana, and a bridge over the Red River at or near Shreveport, Louisiana, on the surveyed line of said railroad. Sec. 2. That said company may build one or both of said bridges as a draw-bridge, with a pivot or other form of draw or with unbroken or continuous spans: Provided, That if the same shall be made of unbroken or continuous spans it shall not be of less elevation in any case than fifty feet above high-water mark, as ascertained at the point of location, to the bottom chord of the bridge, nor shall the spans of said bridge be less than two hundred feet in length, and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of the river, and the main span shall be over the main channel of the river, and not less than two hundred feet in length: And provided also, That if one or both of said bridges shall be built as a draw-bridge the same shall be constructed as a pivot draw-bridge with a draw over the main channel of the river at an accessible and navigable point and with spans of not less than one hundred and thirty feet in the clear on either side of the pivot-pier, the adjoining spans to be not less than two hundred feet in the clear, and said spans shall not be less than fifty-six feet above extreme low-water mark for the bridge over the Ouachita, and not less than thirty-six feet above extreme low-water mark for the bridge over the Red River, and not less than ten feet above extreme high-water mark, measuring to the bottom chord of the bridge; and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel to the current of the river: And provided also, That said draw shall be opened promptly upon reasonable notice or signal for the passage of boats, and in no case shall unnecessary delay occur in opening the said draw after the passage of trains.

Sec. 3. That the company or corporation authorized to construct the bridges referred to over the Ouachita and Red Rivers shall give notice, by publication for one week in newspapers having a wide circulation, in not less than two newspapers in the cities of New Orleans, Memphis, Little Rock, Monroe, and Vicksburg, and shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination, a design and drawings of the bridges and piers, and a map of their location, giving for the space of at least one mile above and one mile below the proposed location, the topography of the banks of the rivers, the shore-lines at high and low water, the direction of the currents at all stages, and the soundings accurately showing the bed of the streams, the location of any other bridge or bridges, and shall furnish such other information as may be required for a full and satisfactory understanding of the subject by the Secretary of War; and if the Secretary of War is satisfied that the provisions of the law have been complied with in regard to location, the building of the piers may be at once commenced; but if it shall appear that the conditions prescribed by this act cannot be complied with at the locations where it is desired to construct the bridges, the Secretary of War shall, after considering any remonstrances filed against the building of said bridges and furnishing copies of such remonstrances to the board of engineers provided for in this act, detail a board composed of three experienced officers of the Corps of Engineers to examine the case, and may, on their recommendation, authorize such modifications in the requirements of this act, as to location and piers, as will permit the construction of the bridges, not, however, diminishing the width of the spans contemplated by this act: Provided, That the free navigation of the rivers be not materially injured thereby.

Sec. 4. That said bridges, when constructed under this act, shall be lawful structures, and shall be recognized and known as post-roads; and no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, troops, and munitions of war of the United States than the rate per mile paid for their transportation over the railroads or public highways leading to said bridges; and in case of any litigation arising from any alleged obstruction of the navigation of the said river, created by the construction of said bridges, or in the construction of this act, the same shall be tried in the district court of the United States for the district in which said alleged obstruction is located.

Sec. 5. That all railway companies desiring to use the said bridges shall have and be entitled to equal rights and privileges in the passage of the same, and in the use of the machinery and fixtures thereof, and of all the approaches thereto, under and upon such terms and conditions as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of War, upon hearing the allegations and proofs of the parties, in case they shall not agree.

Sec. 6. That the structures herein authorized shall be built under and subject to such regulations for the security of the navigation of said rivers as the Secretary of War shall prescribe; and the said structures shall be at all times so kept and managed as to offer reasonable and proper means for the passage of steamboats and other vessels through and under said structures; and the said structures shall be changed, at the cost and expense of the owners thereof, from time to time, as the Secretary of War may direct, so as to preserve the free and convenient navigation of said rivers; and the authority to erect and continue said bridges shall be subject to revocation by law whenever the public good shall, in the judgment of Congress, so require.

SEC. 7. That the right to alter or amend this act, in case of violation thereof by said company, or to prevent or remove all the material obstructions to the navigation of said rivers by the construction of said bridges, is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. REA. I will not call for the reading of the report, unless some gentleman desires to hear it read. I will state, for the information of the House, that this bill has been submitted to the Engineer Department and its provisions have been approved by that department. I think the provisions of this bill protect, as far as they can, the commercial interests upon these rivers, and unless some member desires to hear the report read I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. REA moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LIGHT-HOUSE AT GRAND MARAIS.

Mr. DUNNELL, from the Committee on Commerce, reported adversely upon the petition for the establishment of a light-house at Grand Marais, on Lake Michigan; and the same was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

Mr. DUNNELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the petition was laid on the table; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. O'NEILL. In connection with that report, I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota a question. I would like to ask whether, when a proposition to build a light-house carries with it an appropriation, it is proper that it should be referred and reported upon by his committee?

Mr. DUNNELL. It is customary to refer to the Committee on Commerce all petitions and memorials for light-houses, and upon the report of that committee depends whether an appropriation shall be made or not.

Mr. O'NEILL. That is the information that I wanted to obtain; but the Committee on Appropriations, I understand, have final jurisdiction over this matter of the establishment of light-houses.

Mr. DUNNELL. They have final jurisdiction according to the practice of the House.

EXTENSION OF THE OPERATIONS OF THE LIGHT-HOUSE BOARD.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 2486) extending the operations of the Light-House Board over the Illinois River, and for other purposes.

The bill was read. It provides that the jurisdiction of the Light-House Board, created by the act entitled "An act making appropriations for light-houses, light-boats, buoys, &c., and providing for the erection and establishment of the same, and for other purposes," approved July 31, 1852, is thereby extended over the Illinois River, for the establishment of such lights, day-beacons, and buoys as may be necessary for the use of vessels navigating that stream; and the said board is thereby authorized to establish a new light-house district, to be composed of such part or parts of the Mississippi, Ohio, and Missouri Rivers as it may deem expedient, to be in all respects similar to the already existing light-house districts; and is thereby authorized to lease the necessary ground for all such lights and beacons as are used to point out changeable channels, and which, in consequence, cannot be made permanent; and, further, that the said Light-House Board is thereby authorized to use any balances remaining unexpended from any appropriations heretofore made for the maintenance of lights on the Mississippi, Missouri, and Ohio Rivers, not to exceed $27,000, for the purpose of building a steam-tender for the use of the Light-House Board on the western rivers.

Mr. KENNA. I ask that the papers accompanying the bill may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 18, 1878.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 12th instant, inclosing for the views of this Department House bill No. 2486, introduced by you, providing for the extension of the operations of the Light-House Board over the Illinois River, and for other purposes.

In reply I have respectfully to transmit herewith a copy of a letter of the 14th instant from Captain J. G. Walker, United States Navy, naval secretary of the Light-House Board, in which it is stated that the results of the extension of the jurisdiction of the board over the Mississippi, Missouri, and Ohio Rivers have been so satisfactory that, in its opinion, the interests of commerce and navigation would be greatly benefited by the lighting and buoyage of the Illinois River under its direction in the same manner that the western rivers named are now cared for.

The board is of the opinion that as the bill provides that unexpended balances from appropriations heretofore made for the maintenance of lights on the Mississippi, Missouri, and Ohio Rivers not to exceed $27,000 may be used for the purpose of building a steam-tender for the use of the Light-House Board on the western rivers, no additional appropriation will be necessary.

The bill transmitted by you is herewith returned.

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary.

Hon. B. M. KNAPP, M. C.,
House of Representatives.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT.
OFFICE OF THE LIGHT-HOUSE BOARD,
Washington, D. C., February 24, 1878.

SIR: Herewith inclosed I have the honor to transmit a letter dated January 17, 1878, addressed to the Light-House Board by Hon. B. M. KNAPP, M. C., and H. R. bill 2486, referred to therein, providing for the extension of the operations of the Light-House Board over the Illinois River, and for other purposes.

Mr. KNAPP desires to be informed as to the views of the Light-House Board on the subject-matter of this bill and as to whether any appropriation will be needed to carry the same into execution.

In reply, I beg leave to say that the results of the extension of the jurisdiction of the Light-House Board over the Mississippi, Missouri, and Ohio Rivers have been so satisfactory that the Light-House Board is of the opinion that the interests of commerce and navigation would be greatly benefited by the lighting and buoyage of the Illinois River under the direction of the board, in the same manner that the western rivers named are now cared for.

As the bill provides that the unexpended balances from appropriations heretofore made for the maintenance of lights on the Mississippi, Missouri, and Ohio Rivers, not to exceed $27,000, may be used for the purpose of building a steam-tender for the use of the Light-House Board on the western rivers, no additional appropriation will be necessary.

Very respectfully,

J. G. WALKER,
Naval Secretary.

Hon. SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. KENNA. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KENNA moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HAILING-PLACE OF UNITED STATES VESSELS.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1968) to provide for vessels of the United States hailing from places where they are owned or built.

The bill was read. It provides that the hailing-place of every registered, enrolled and licensed, or licensed vessel of the United States, as provided in section 4178 and section 4334 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, may hereafter be the town or city where said vessel is built, or where the husband or managing owner or owners of said vessel shall reside; and the name of such town or city shall be painted on the stern of such vessel in the manner and subject to the penalties provided in said sections.

Mr. ROBERTS. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROBERTS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CUSTOMS-REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. ROBERTS also, from the same committee, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 3228) to amend section 23 of the act approved June 22, 1874, entitled "An act to amend customs-revenue laws and to repeal moiety laws."

The bill was read. It provides that the twenty-third section of an act entitled "An act to amend customs-revenue laws and to repeal moiety laws," approved the 22d day of June, 1874, be, and the same is hereby, amended, to take effect from that date, as follows: after the words "to the naval officers of the districts of Boston and Charlestown, Massachusetts; and San Francisco, California; and Philadelphia, Pennsylvania," insert the words "and Baltimore, Maryland; and New Orleans, Louisiana;" and after the words "to the surveyors of the ports of Boston, Massachusetts; and San Francisco, California; and Philadelphia, Pennsylvania," insert the words "and Portland, Maine; and Baltimore, Maryland; and New Orleans, Louisiana."

Mr. GARFIELD. What committee does that bill come from?

The SPEAKER. From the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GARFIELD. It seems to me that that is a matter that ought to have gone to the Committee of Ways and Means. I know nothing about the merits of the question, and it seems to me that it belongs to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. ROBERTS. It was referred to the Committee on Commerce and has received the consideration of that committee, and we report it with a recommendation from the Secretary of the Treasury in favor of its passage.

Mr. GARFIELD. I reserve all points of order upon the bill until I can have an opportunity of examining it.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to say for the information of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that this subject was brought to the attention of the Committee on Commerce by a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury himself, supplemented by a communication from the Commissioner of Customs explaining the necessity for this change in the law. The reason for desiring the passage of this bill is that it will relieve the Treasury Department very much in keeping its accounts.

Mr. ROBERTS. I ask that the letters of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Customs, together with the report of the committee, be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 28, 1878.

SIR: I have the honor to call your attention to the inclosed copy of a communication of this date from the Commissioner of Customs, suggesting an amendment to section 23 of the act approved June 22, 1874, commonly known as the act to repeal moiety, and to express my concurrence in his view that this amendment should be adopted.

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary.

HON. S. J. RANDALL,
Speaker House of Representatives.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONER OF CUSTOMS,
Washington, D. C., February 28, 1878.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose a draft of a bill to amend the 23d section of the act approved June 22, 1874, entitled "An act to amend the customs-revenue laws and to repeal moiety," and to state my reason for calling your attention to the matter.

By the act above referred to a stated annual salary was provided for the collectors of customs of the districts of Portland, Maine; Boston, Massachusetts; New York; Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; Baltimore, Maryland; New Orleans, Louisiana, and San Francisco, California, and the naval officers of all of these ports excepting Baltimore, Maryland, and New Orleans, Louisiana, and for the surveyors of all excepting Baltimore, Maryland; New Orleans, Louisiana; and Portland, Maine.

There was apparently no reason for the omission, the omitted officers having been paid, prior to the passage of the act of 22d June, 1874, under the same law and the same rate of compensation as those included in the act. I therefore feel justified in supposing the omission to be accidental and should be corrected.

I also deem it but just to the parties interested that the correction should date from the time the omission occurred.

I would further state that, under a misconception of the law, collectors of customs have advanced money to the surveyors, which money has been retained by the surveyors to make up the deficiency of fees and now stands as balances against them, and while it is possible that these sums may be recovered in a suit at law the equities of the case seem to be in favor of the surveyors.

Besides, the business at the ports mentioned in the inclosed draft has so decreased that the fees, the only source of emolument to the officers designated, no longer afford the maximum compensation.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. C. JOHNSON,
Commissioner of Customs.

HON. JOHN SHERMAN,
Secretary of the Treasury.

The Clerk also read the report of the committee, as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3828) having considered the same, report that the amendment to section 23 of the act approved June 22, 1874, entitled "An act to amend customs-revenue laws and to repeal moiety," contemplated by said bill, is in the opinion of this committee one most proper to be made. There appears to be no justifiable reason why the amendment should not have been incorporated in the original act, and the committee agree with the Commissioner of Customs in supposing the omission to have been accidental, and should therefore be corrected. The letter of the Commissioner, addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury, suggesting the amendment covered by the said bill, is herewith submitted as a part of this report. The committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say that I will not make any point of order—

Mr. BURCHARD. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. GARFIELD. Originally the subject manifestly belonged to the Committee of Ways and Means; but as it has been referred to the Committee on Commerce, who have had correspondence with the Secretary of the Treasury, which seems to me to indicate that the proposed change in the law should be made, I do not care to defend the rights of the Committee of Ways and Means in the matter, if no other member does.

Mr. BURCHARD. From the reading of these papers I am unable to say whether this bill should pass or not. The act of 1874, to which the bill refers, was passed by the House after a hearing of nearly two months before the Committee of Ways and Means. The subject was a long time under consideration in the House, and I think there was no mistake on the part of those who favored the action of the committee at that time. I was not a member of the subcommittee that had especial charge of this subject, but the bill then passed was, I think, purposely framed to apply only to the ports named in the act, because under the then existing law the custom officers at those ports received excessive fees, and the intention was to limit their compensation. It was the purpose, if my recollection is correct, not to extend the act any further. Now, as to the reasons for extending that legislation to the ports named in this bill, and what change it would make in the rates of compensation, I would like to hear from the committee.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not undertake to dispute the statement that the subject-matter of the original law may have been considered by the Committee of Ways and Means; but this bill proposes a simple change in the law to remedy an omission which, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, occurred through inadvertence. The omission of certain ports from the act of 1874 causes, as he says, difficulty and complication in keeping the accounts of the Department without any counterbalancing advantage. He simply asks that the customs officers at the ports named in the bill be brought under the same provisions of law which apply to officers of the same rank at other ports. His main reason for urging the passage of this bill is that under the existing laws he is required to keep two sets of accounts, involving unnecessary trouble. I do not think there is anything objectionable in the bill.

Mr. BURCHARD. I desire the chairman of the committee to state the exact effect which this bill will have upon the salaries or compensation of the custom officers at the respective ports named. The object of Congress in passing the act of 1874 upon the recommendation of the Committee of Ways and Means was to limit the compensation paid to the collectors and naval officers at the ports named in that act. That compensation was found in certain cases to be excessive. The forfeitures and fines amounted in some instances to $200,000 or $300,000, so that the share of the customs officers was sometimes $50,000 or $100,000. By the act of 1874 we undertook to limit the compensation of these officers, and provided for paying them according to the terms of that act.

Mr. REAGAN. Does the gentleman see anything objectionable in this bill?

Mr. BURCHARD. If it tends to increase the compensation of these officers I object to it; if it tends to diminish it I have no objection. As to the effect of the bill upon the compensation of these officers I desire to hear from the chairman or the gentleman having charge of the bill.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I think my friend from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] is somewhat mistaken in regard to the original purpose in the passage of the act of 1874. So far as my information goes that act was prepared simply because of the fact that the fees had generally diminished all over the country; the compensation was uncertain and indefinite; and the Department recommended the passage of that act for the same reasons upon which it founds its recommendation of this bill.

The bill is reported at the special instance of the Treasury Department, in consequence of irregularities in the accounts of the surveyors at Baltimore and New Orleans and the naval officers at Portland, Baltimore, and New Orleans. The Department sees no reason for making any distinction between these ports and those named in the original act, and for that reason suggests the passage of this amendatory bill, in order that justice may be done to all without discrimination as to locality.

But, sir, without going further into the matter, as the House is pretty well acquainted with the facts and circumstances, I now demand the previous question.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Has not the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired and the bill goes over.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ELAM, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 2818) to authorize T. and J. W. Gaff & Co. to use a certain building in the city of Aurora, Indiana, for the rectification of distilled spirits; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4394) to prohibit the coinage of the twenty-cent piece of silver.

HOUSE EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. COX, of New York. I move to go to the business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to introduce a resolution for reference only.

Mr. COX, of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois for that purpose.

Mr. SPRINGER, by unanimous consent, submitted a resolution authorizing the Committee on Civil-Service Reform to ascertain the number of employés of the House and what changes are necessary, if any, to secure the efficiency of the service; which was referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

ROSARIO AND CARMEN MINING COMPANY.

Mr. WILSON. I ask unanimous consent to submit a report in writing from the Committee on Foreign Affairs on the petition of the Rosario and Carmen Mining Company of California for some provision for the investigation and settlement of its claim against the government of Mexico for injury to its property and interest in Mexico in the year 1864 and to move that it be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to be considered in connection with the bill (H. R. No. 2117) to provide for the distribution of the awards made under the convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Mexico, concluded on the 4th day of July, 1868.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CLYMER. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3822) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, and to ask for the present consideration of the subject.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report from the Committee on Appropriations.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3822) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, together with the amendments of the Senate thereto, having considered the same, beg leave to report as follows:

They recommend concurrence in the amendments of the Senate numbered 6, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 31, 32, and 36.

They recommend non-concurrence in the amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 19, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 33, 34, 35, 37, 38, 39, 40, and 41.

Mr. CLYMER. Mr. Speaker, as the naval appropriation bill passed the House it appropriated $14,033,684. The Senate returned it to this House with amendments increasing the appropriation to the extent of $300,844.70, making a total of $14,339,528.70. The Committee on Appropriations have recommended concurrence in the Senate amendments amounting to $30,902.20. They have recommended non-concurrence in amendments making appropriations to the amount of $169,942.50.

If it be the desire of the House I will explain specifically each amendment of the Senate. I can only say now, however, that the Committee on Appropriations have given the subject grave and thorough consideration, and that if the House should adopt the report which I have submitted from that committee I do not think, from the knowledge which I have of the subject, the committee of conference between the two Houses will have much difficulty in coming to an agreement.

The SPEAKER. If there be no demand for a separate vote the question will be on the adoption of the report of the committee as a whole.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not know anything about the merits of the several amendments, but I do not think it is a good practice for the House unless it is crowded for time near the end of a session to throw a whole batch of amendments before the House and act upon them in gross. It is substantially taking out of the supervision of the House all the matters embraced in the amendments of the Senate. We will be acting more intelligently, it occurs to me, to have the amendments separately read, and then, if desired, gentlemen can ask for a separate vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio can demand a separate vote on any amendment as it is read. The Chair, however, would suggest that on the amendments of the Senate in which concurrence is recommended there be a single vote.

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well; let the vote be taken in gross on the amendments of the Senate in which concurrence is recommended, and then on the other amendments, in which non-concurrence is recommended, we can have a separate vote on each amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio demands a division of the question.

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The question then recurs on the amendments of the Senate in which concurrence is recommended by the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to; and the amendments indicated were concurred in.

Mr. CLYMER moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the amendments of the Senate in which non-concurrence has been recommended, and the Clerk will read the first amendment?

Mr. GARFIELD. I am told by the gentleman from Pennsylvania these are minor amendments about which the committee generally are agreed, and that being the case I withdraw my objection to allowing the vote to be taken on the amendments in gross.

The SPEAKER. There being no further demand for a division of the question, the vote will now be taken on the amendments of the Senate in which non-concurrence is recommended.

The report of the Committee on Appropriations was agreed to, and the amendments of the Senate indicated were non-concurred in.

Mr. CLYMER moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SCHOONER GEORGE L. TREADWELL.

Mr. DOUGLAS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4567) allowing the owners of the schooner George L. Treadwell, of Baltimore, Maryland, to change the name to Nassau; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

ROBERT T. CHAPMAN.

Mr. GIDDINGS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4568) to remove the political disabilities of Robert T. Chapman; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, provides, two-thirds of each House concurring therein, that the political disabilities imposed upon Robert T. Chapman, of Wharton County, Texas, by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, on account of participation in the rebellion, be removed.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Is that accompanied by a petition?

Mr. GIDDINGS. It is accompanied by the usual petition.

BUSINESS ON THE SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. COX, of New York. I now insist on my motion that the House proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask that the bill be read.

The bill was read.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LYNDE. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice.

Mr. BUTLER. I have no objection to that reference, and withdraw my motion.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice.

SECTIONS 3739, 3740, 3741, AND 3742 OF THE REVISED STATUTES.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 706) authorizing the President of the United States to make certain negotiations with the Ute Indians in the State of Colorado; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. PAGE. I ask that the bill be read.

The bill was read. It authorizes and empowers the President of the United States to enter into negotiations with the Ute Indians, in the State of Colorado, for the consolidation of all the bands into one agency, to be located on the White River, or near said river, and for the extinguishment of their right to the southern portion of their reservation in said State, and to report his proceedings under the act to Congress for its consideration and approval; the expense of such negotiations to be paid by the United States, and to be hereafter appropriated.

Mr. PAGE. I have been instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to request that this Senate bill be put upon its passage in lieu of House bill No. 3021, which was referred to the committee. The bill has been carefully considered by the committee.

Mr. MILLS. I wish to inquire if there is anything in the bill providing for the removal of these Indians to the Indian Territory?

Mr. BOONE. There is not.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PAGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CULTIVATION OF TIMBER ON THE PUBLIC DOMAIN.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 396) to amend section 2464 of the Revised Statutes, relating to cultivation of timber on the public domain; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read. It amends section 2464 of the Revised Statutes so as to read as follows:

Every person being an adult citizen of the United States, or who has declared his intention to become a citizen, who plants, protects, and keeps in a healthy growing condition for ten years ten acres of valuable forest timber, the trees thereon not being more than four feet apart each way, on any quarter section of the public lands, shall be entitled to a patent for such quarter section at the expiration of ten years, on making proof of such fact by not less than two credible witnesses: Provided, That only one quarter in any section shall be thus granted, and only one quarter section shall be thus granted to any one person: And provided further, That any person who shall have heretofore planted and cultivated trees not more than twelve feet apart each way to the extent of twenty acres or more on one quarter section, and who shall in all other respects comply with the requirements of this act, shall be entitled to its privileges and benefits to the extent of one quarter section only.

Mr. COX, of New York. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I desire to say that that bill or a bill almost similar to it was considered by the Committee on Public Lands and that that committee ordered it to be reported to the House favorably, and I therefore move that this bill be put upon its passage. I believe it meets the unanimous approval of the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. COX, of New York. If the bill has already been considered by the Committee on Public Lands I have no objection to its passage.

Mr. DUNNELL. It has been adopted by the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. OLIVER. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BEEBE. Does not this bill dispose of public property?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. BEEBE. Then should it not have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. The point of order would be well taken if it had been made in time.

Mr. BEEBE. Cannot the question be raised upon a motion to commit?

The SPEAKER. If the point of order had been made in time it would have been held good.

Mr. BEEBE. I think it only right that a bill of this character should be referred to a committee.

Mr. DUNNELL. The subject has already been considered by the Committee on Public Lands and they have agreed to a bill almost the same as this.

Mr. WELCH. I call for the reading of the bill again.

The bill was again read.

Mr. BEEBE. There is nothing in that bill to prevent any person from planting a number of trees and taking up as many quarter sections of the public lands as he desires. There is nothing that requires that he shall reside upon the lands so taken up, either under the pre-emption or the homestead laws.

Mr. DUNNELL. The object of the bill is simply this: there has been a law in operation for the last five years granting the right to enter a quarter section of the public lands upon which trees were to be cultivated to the extent of forty acres, and after eight years of residence or cultivation, if the trees were found to be in good health and condition, a patent was to be issued to the party cultivating the land for the same. The bill now before us reduces the quantity of acres to be cultivated although it provides that the same number of trees shall be planted. It has been found by practice that a larger area was required for this number of trees by the law than was necessary.

Mr. BEEBE. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Minnesota whether under the law as it now stands any individual can avail himself of more than one quarter section?

Mr. DUNNELL. No more.

Mr. CLARK, of Iowa. Is not this the bill which has been substantially agreed upon by the Committee on Public Lands of the House?

Mr. DUNNELL. I understand that it is substantially the same.

Mr. BEEBE. If an individual has already pre-empted a quarter section of land, is he allowed to pre-empt another quarter section under this law?

Mr. DUNNELL. He may; this is additional to the right to enter under the homestead or pre-emption law.

Mr. BEEBE. Are the Committee on Public Lands unanimous in their approval of this bill?

Mr. DUNNELL. I understand so; I am not a member of the Committee on Public Lands, but I would say further that under the existing law no claim has yet been completed.

Mr. BEEBE. I am given to understand that this bill is not the same in all its particulars as that agreed to by the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DUNNELL. In its general and essential features it is precisely the same bill, and I trust that it will be passed.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I ask that the bill be put upon its passage.

Mr. EDEN. I think the bill had better be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, as there seems to be some difference as to its features.

The question was taken upon Mr. OLIVER's motion; and on a division there were—ayes 66, noes 53; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BEEBE and Mr. WELCH were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 87, noes 70. So the motion to refer was agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred to the Committee on Public Lands; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOSIAH H. PILLSBURY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 653) for the relief of Josiah H. Pillsbury; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

FORT FETTERMAN, WYOMING TERRITORY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 961) to authorize the Secretary of War to relinquish certain portions of the United States military reservation of Fort Fetterman, Wyoming Territory; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. EDEN. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

R. F. LEHMAN.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 767) authorizing the Secretary of War to allow the interment in the national cemetery at New Berne, in the State of North Carolina, of the remains of the late R. F. Lehman, late a commissioner of the United States circuit court in the eastern district of North Carolina; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. BEEBE. I move that the bill be now put upon its passage.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BEEBE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THOMAS J. CHOATE AND OTHERS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 333) for the relief of Thomas J. Choate, Erastus Foster, Milton Ladd, Clarence E. Haney, William A. Hilt, Kneeland F. Huckaby, and William Blackburn, late privates in Company F, Third Regiment Arkansas Cavalry Volunteers; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. BEEBE. I move that this bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM L. HICKAM.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 378) for the relief of William L. Hickam, of Missouri; which was read a first and second time.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to cause the pension agent at Saint Louis, Missouri, to issue and deliver to William L. Hickam a duplicate of the check No. 61872 for the sum of $1,616.33, in favor of William L. Hickam, the guardian of the minor children of Hilary J. Jenkins, for one lost in the mail November 30, 1876, provided that the Secretary of the Interior is satisfied that the same has not been paid, and that said Hickam give bond, with security approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, to hold the United States harmless against the payment of the original draft.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I will state for the information of the House that a bill similar to this passed both Houses of Congress at the last session of the last Congress, but was not signed by the President. It is simply for the issue of a duplicate check in place of the original which was lost.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM D. ADAMS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 997) for the relief of William D. Adams; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. EDEN. I think this bill should be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. MILLS. Let it go to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it should be referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. EDEN. I make that motion.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee of Claims.

PACIFIC RAILROAD FUNDING BILL.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 15) to alter and amend the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862; and also to alter and amend the act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, in amendment of said first-named act; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. COX, of New York. I move to put this bill upon its passage.

Mr. BUTLER. Let it be read first.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas on the 1st day of July, A. D. 1862, Congress passed an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes;" and

Whereas afterward, on the 2d day of July, A. D. 1864, Congress passed an act in amendment of said first-mentioned act; and

Whereas the Union Pacific Railroad Company, named in said acts, and under the authority thereof, undertook to construct a railway, after the passage thereof, over some part of the line mentioned in said acts; and

Whereas, under the authority of the said two acts, the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California, a corporation existing under the laws of the State of California, undertook to construct a railway, after the passage of said acts, over some part of the line mentioned in said acts; and

Whereas the United States, upon demand of said Central Pacific Railroad Company, have heretofore issued, by way of loan and as provided in said acts, to and for the benefit of said company, in aid of the purposes named in said acts, the bonds of the United States, payable in thirty years from the date thereof, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum, payable half yearly, to the amount of $25,885,130, which said bonds have been sold in the market or otherwise disposed of by said company; and

Whereas the said Central Pacific Railroad Company has issued and disposed of an amount of its own bonds equal to the amount so issued by the United States, and secured the same by mortgage, and which are, if lawfully issued and disposed of, a prior and paramount lien, in the respect mentioned in said acts, to that of the United States, as stated, and secured thereby; and

Whereas, after the passage of said acts, the Western Pacific Railroad Company, a corporation then existing under the laws of California, did, under the authority of Congress, become the assignee of the rights, duties, and obligations of the said Central Pacific Railroad Company, as provided in the act of Congress passed on the 3d of March, A. D. 1865, and did, under the authority of the said act and of the acts aforesaid, construct a railroad from the city of San José to the city of Sacramento, in California, and did demand and receive from the United States the sum of $1,570,560 of the bonds of the United States, of the description before mentioned as issued to the Central Pacific Company, and in the same manner and under the provisions of said acts; and upon and in respect of the bonds so issued to both said companies the United States have paid interest to the sum of more than thirteen and a half million dollars, which has not been reimbursed; and

Whereas said Western Pacific Railroad Company has issued and disposed of an amount of its own bonds equal to the amount so issued by the United States to it, and secured the same by mortgage, which are, if lawfully issued and disposed of, a prior and paramount lien to that of the United States, as stated, and secured thereby; and

Whereas said Western Pacific Railroad Company has since become merged in and consolidated with said Central Pacific Railroad Company, under the name of the Central Pacific Railroad Company, whereby the said Central Pacific Railroad Company has become liable to all the burdens, duties, and obligations before resting upon said Western Pacific Railroad Company; and divers other railroad companies have been merged in and consolidated with said Central Pacific Railroad Company; and

Whereas the United States, upon the demand of the said Union Pacific Railroad Company, have heretofore issued, by way of loan to it and as provided in said acts, the bonds of the United States, payable in thirty years from the date thereof, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum, payable half yearly, the principal sum of which amount to $27,236,512; on which the United States have paid over $10,000,000 interest over and above all reimbursements; which said bonds have been sold in the market or otherwise disposed of by said corporation; and

Whereas said corporation has issued and disposed of an amount of its own bonds equal to the amount so issued to it by the United States as aforesaid, and secured the same by mortgage, and which are, if lawfully issued and disposed of, a prior and paramount lien, in the respect mentioned in said acts, to that of the United States, as stated, and secured thereby; and

Whereas the total liabilities (exclusive of interest to accrue) to all creditors, including the United States, of the said Central Pacific Company amount in the aggregate to more than $26,000,000, and those of the said Union Pacific Railroad Company to more than $28,000,000; and

Whereas the United States, in view of the indebtedness and operations of said several railroad companies, respectively, and of the disposition of their respective incomes, are not, and cannot without further legislation be, secure in their interests in and concerning said respective railroads and corporations, either as mentioned in said acts or otherwise; and

Whereas a due regard to the rights of said several companies, respectively, as mentioned in said act of 1862, as well as just security to the United States in the premises, and in respect of all the matters set forth in said act, require that the said act of 1862 be altered and amended as hereinafter enacted; and

Whereas, by reason of the premises also, as well as for other causes of public good and justice, the powers provided and reserved in said act of 1864 for the amendment and alteration thereof ought also to be exercised as hereinafter enacted; Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the net earnings mentioned in said act of 1862 of said railroad companies, respectively, shall be ascertained by deducting from the gross amount of their earnings, respectively, the necessary expenses actually paid within the year in operating the same and keeping the same in a state of repair, and also the sum paid by them, respectively, within the year in discharge of interest on their first-mortgage bonds, whose lien has priority over the lien of the United States, and excluding from consideration all sums owing or paid by said companies, respectively, for interest upon any other portion of their indebtedness; and the foregoing provision shall be deemed and taken as an amendment of said act of 1864, as well as of said act of 1862. This section shall take effect on the 30th day of June next, and be applicable to all computations of net earnings thereafter; but it shall not affect any right of the United States or of either of said railroad companies existing prior thereto.

SEC. 2. That the whole amount of compensation which may, from time to time, be due to said several railroad companies, respectively, for services rendered for the Government shall be retained by the United States, one-half thereof to be presently applied to the liquidation of the interest paid and to be paid by the United States upon the bonds so issued by it as aforesaid to each of said corporations severally, and the other half thereof to be turned into the sinking fund hereinafter provided, for the uses therein mentioned.

SEC. 3. That there shall be established in the Treasury of the United States a sinking fund, which shall be invested by the Secretary of the Treasury in bonds of the United States, and the semi-annual income thereof shall be in like manner from time to time invested, and the same shall accumulate and be disposed of as hereinafter mentioned. And in making such investments the Secretary shall prefer the 5 per cent. bonds of the United States, unless for good reasons appearing to him, and which he shall report to Congress, he shall at any time deem it advisable to invest in other bonds of the United States. All the bonds belonging to said fund shall, as fast as they shall be obtained, be so stamped as to show that they belong to said fund, and that they are not good in the hands of other holders than the Secretary of the Treasury until they shall have been indorsed by him and publicly disposed of pursuant to this act.

SEC. 4. That there shall be carried to the credit of the said fund, on the 1st day of February in each year, the one-half of the compensation for services hereinafter named, rendered for the Government by said Central Pacific Railroad Company, not applied in liquidation of interest; and in addition thereto the said company shall, on said day in each year, pay into the Treasury, to the credit of said sinking fund, the sum of $1,200,000, or so much thereof as shall be necessary to make the 5 per cent. of the net earnings of its said road payable to the United States under said act of 1862, and the whole sum earned by it as compensation for services rendered for the United States, together with the sum by this section required to be paid, amount in the aggregate to 25 per cent. of the whole net earnings of said railroad company, ascertained and defined as hereinafter provided, for the year ending on the 31st day of December next preceding.

That there shall be carried to the credit of the said fund, on the 1st day of February in each year, the one-half of the compensation for services hereinafter named, rendered for the Government by said Union Pacific Railroad Company, not applied in liquidation of interest; and in addition thereto, the said company shall, on said day in each year, pay into the Treasury, to the credit of said sinking fund, the sum of $300,000, or so much thereof as shall be necessary to make the 5 per cent. of the net earnings of its said road payable to the United States under said act of 1862, and the whole sum earned by it as compensation for services rendered for the United States, together with the sum by this section required to be paid, amount in the aggregate to 25 per cent. of the whole net earnings of said railroad company, ascertained and defined as hereinafter provided, for the year ending on the 31st day of December next preceding.

SEC. 5. That whenever it shall be made satisfactorily to appear to the Secretary of the Treasury, by either of said companies, that 75 per cent. of its net earnings as hereinafter defined, for any current year are or were insufficient to pay the interest for such year upon the obligations of such company, in respect of which obligations there may exist a lien paramount to that of the United States, and that such interest has been paid out of such net earnings, said Secretary is hereby authorized, and it is made his duty, to remit for such current year so much of the 25 per cent. of net earnings required to be paid into the sinking fund, as aforesaid, as may have been thus applied and used in the payment of interest as aforesaid.

SEC. 6. That no dividend shall be voted, made, or paid for or to any stockholder or stockholders in either of said companies respectively at any time when the said company shall be in default in respect of the payment either of the sums required as aforesaid to be paid into said sinking fund, or in respect of the payment of the said 5 per cent. of the net earnings, or in respect of interest upon any debt the lien of which, or of the debt on which it may accrue, is paramount to that of the United States; and any officer or person who shall vote, declare, make, or pay, and any stockholder of any of said companies who shall receive any such dividend contrary to the provisions of this act, shall be liable to the United States for the amount thereof, which, when recovered, shall be paid into said sinking fund. And every such officer, person, or stockholder who shall knowingly vote, declare, make, or pay any such dividend, contrary to the provisions of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $100, and by imprisonment not exceeding one year.

SEC. 7. That the said sinking fund so established and accumulated shall, at the maturity of said bonds so respectively issued by the United States, be applied to the payment and satisfaction thereof, according to the interest and proportion of each of said companies in said fund, and of all interest paid by the United States thereon, and not reimbursed, subject to the provisions of the next section.

SEC. 8. That said sinking fund so established and accumulated shall, according to the interest and proportion of said companies respectively therein, be held for the protection, security, and benefit of the lawful and just holders of any mortgage or lien debts of such companies respectively, lawfully paramount to the rights of the United States, and for the claims of other creditors, if any, lawfully chargeable upon the funds so required to be paid into said sinking fund, according to their respective lawful priorities, as well as for the United States, according to the principles of equity, to the end that all persons having any claim upon said sinking fund may be entitled thereto in due order; but the provisions of this section shall not operate or be held to impair any existing legal right, except in the manner in this act provided, of any mortgage, lien, or other creditor of any of said companies respectively, nor to excuse any of said companies respectively from the duty of discharging, out of other funds, its debts to any creditor except the United States.

SEC. 9. That all sums due to the United States from any of said companies respectively, whether payable presently or not, and all sums required to be paid to the United States or into the Treasury, or into said sinking fund under this act, or under the acts hereinafter referred to, or otherwise, are hereby declared to be a lien upon all the property, estate, rights, and franchises of every description granted or conveyed by the United States to any of said companies respectively or jointly, and also upon all the estate and property, real, personal, and mixed, assets and income of the said several railroad companies respectively, from whatever source derived, subject to any lawfully prior and paramount mortgage, lien, or claim thereon. But this section shall not be construed to prevent said companies respectively from using and disposing of any of their property or assets in the ordinary, proper, and lawful course of their current business, in good faith and for valuable consideration.

SEC. 10. That it is hereby made the duty of the Attorney-General of the United States to enforce, by proper proceeding against the said several railroad companies respectively or jointly, or against either of them, and others, all the rights of the United States under this act and under the acts hereinafter mentioned, and under any other act of Congress or right of the United States; and in any suit or proceeding already commenced, or that may be hereafter commenced, against any of said companies, either alone or with other parties, in respect of matters arising under this act, or under the acts or rights hereinafter mentioned or referred to, it shall be the duty of the court to determine the very right of the matter without regard to matters of form, joinder of parties, multifariousness, or other matters not affecting the substantial rights and duties arising out of the matters and acts hereinafter stated and referred to.

SEC. 11. That if either of said railroad companies shall fail to perform all and singular the requirements of this act and of the acts hereinafter mentioned, and of any other act relating to said company, to be by it performed, for the period of six months next after such performance may be due, such failure shall operate as a forfeiture of all the rights, privileges, grants, and franchises derived or obtained by it from the United States; and it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General to cause such forfeiture to be judicially enforced.

SEC. 12. That nothing in this act shall be construed or taken in any wise to affect or impair the right of Congress at any time hereafter further to alter, amend, or repeal the said acts hereinafter mentioned; and this act shall be subject to alteration, amendment, or repeal, as, in the opinion of Congress, justice or the public welfare may require. And nothing herein contained shall be held to deny, exclude, or impair any right or remedy in the premises now existing in favor of the United States.

SEC. 13. That each and every of the provisions in this act contained shall severally and respectively be deemed, taken, and held as in alteration and amendment of said act of 1862 and of said act of 1864 respectively, and of both said acts.

Mr. BUTLER. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUTLER. This bill, as nearly as I can ascertain by following the reading—the printed Senate bill I have ascertained is quite different in many respects from the manuscript bill which has just been read—this bill proposes that certain moneys due from several railroad companies to the United States, and which ought to go into the Treasury of the United States for the general use of the people of the United States, shall be put into a sinking fund and invested in that sinking fund for a long series of years, and that the sinking fund is to be used to pay certain private claimants against these railroad corporations who have an undermortgage. First, it takes out of the Treasury of the United States, or keeps from going into the Treasury, money that ought to go into it, and puts it into a sinking fund to be invested; and, secondly, it disposes of that money by paying it to private individuals without further appropriation by law.

Now, it may be answered that the United States would have to redeem that mortgage because it is an undermortgage. But that question ought to be determined when it comes up by the proper House of Representatives making an appropriation for that purpose. It may not be worth while when that question comes up to redeem that mortgage; the road may not be worth it in those days. It is here proposed by this bill to provide a sinking fund for the redemption of that mortgage, and the whole amount is hereby appropriated.

I think, if there ever was a bill that was a "money bill" in the language of the old law, a funding bill providing a sinking fund for the benefit of private mortgagees is one of those "money bills," and should receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will be kind enough to direct the attention of the Chair to the exact language of the bill upon which he relies.

Mr. BUTLER. I will as nearly as I can, following the printed bill which does not in all respects correspond with the bill read by the clerk.

The first section of the bill provides:

That the net earnings mentioned in said act of 1862, of said railroad companies respectively, shall be ascertained by deducting from the gross amount of their earnings respectively the necessary and actual expenses of operating the same, and keeping the same in a state of repair, and not otherwise, and excluding from consideration all sums owing or paid by said companies respectively for interest upon any portion of their indebtedness; and the foregoing provision shall be deemed and taken as an amendment of said act of 1864, as well as of said act of 1862.

SEC. 2. That the whole amount of compensation which may from time to time be due to said several railroad companies respectively for services rendered for the Government shall be retained by the United States, one half thereof to be presently applied to the liquidation of the interest paid and to be paid by the United States upon the bonds so issued by it as aforesaid, to each of said corporations severally, and the other half thereof to be turned into the sinking fund hereinafter provided for the uses therein mentioned.

Then the third section provides:

That there shall be established in the Treasury of the United States a sinking fund, which shall be invested in bonds of the United States; and the semi-annual income thereof shall be in like manner from time to time invested, and the same shall accumulate and be disposed of as hereinafter mentioned.

The fourth section provides:

That there shall be carried to the credit of the said fund, on the 1st day of February in each year, the one-half of the compensation for services hereinafter named, rendered for the Government by said Central Pacific Railroad Company, not applied in liquidation of interest; and, in addition thereto, the said company shall, on said day in each year, pay into the Treasury, to the credit of said sinking fund, the sum of $1,500,000, or so much thereof as shall be necessary to make the 5 per cent. of the net earnings of its said road payable to the United States under said act of 1862, and the whole sum earned by it as compensation for services rendered for the United States, together with the sum by the section required to be paid, amount in the aggregate to 25 per cent. of the whole net earnings of said railroad company, ascertained and defined as hereinafter provided, for the year ending on the 31st day of December next preceding.

Then the same provisions are applied to certain other railroads and their compensation.

Sections 5, 6, and 7, provide for supervision to see that the sinking fund gets what belongs to it. Then the eighth section provides:

That said sinking fund so established and accumulated shall, according to the interest and proportion of said companies respectively therein, be held for the protection, security, and benefit of the lawful and just holders of any mortgage or lien debts of such companies respectively, lawfully paramount to the rights of the United States, and for the claims of other creditors, if any, lawfully chargeable upon the funds so required to be paid into said sinking fund, according to their respective lawful priorities, as well as for the United States, according to the principles of equity, to the end that all persons having any claim upon said sinking fund may be entitled thereto in due order; but the provisions of this section shall not operate or be held to impair any existing legal right.

Then it is made the duty of the Attorney-General to prosecute; and what is rather remarkable (though it has not anything to do with the point of order) the bill directs the Supreme Court how they shall decide the question.

Restating my point of order, I would say there are certain moneys now due and to become due as compensation from the United States to certain railroads—very large amounts of money. Of these moneys a part is to be paid for a certain purpose into the Treasury of the United States and a part is to be devoted to other purposes. Now, this bill takes those moneys and puts them into the sinking fund to be held with all the interest accruing thereon by the Secretary of the Treasury, as custodian of the fund, and at the end to be paid to the private mortgagees of the road. Here is a fund to pay them in any event. Now, suppose that for any reason at the end of this time—twenty years hence, as it will be I doubt not—this road, by reason of the improvements that may be made within the next generation, should not be worth to the United States or anybody else the amount of the first mortgage; yet that first mortgage is to be paid out of the sinking fund, not leaving to the men who shall come after us at that day the right to judge whether they will appropriate the money of the United States for that purpose at that time.

In stating my point of order, as the Speaker will observe, I have carefully avoided referring to other objections which I may have to the bill. I submit that the bill appropriates money which belongs to the Treasury of the United States, is therefore a money bill, and should receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CARLISLE. Is not the gentleman in error in insisting that this bill makes an appropriation from the Treasury of the United States of money belonging to the Government? Does it not simply provide what disposition shall be made of money belonging to the railroad companies, which is held by the United States in trust for them and their creditors?

Mr. BUTLER. I am very much obliged to my friend for the question. My proposition is that this money, or at least a portion of it, this compensation of the railroad companies, is now by law to go into the Treasury of the United States for the benefit of the Treasury. I do not say that the money is there now. But a bill appropriating the public lands of the United States is treated as a money bill, because it takes away what belongs to the United States and would go into the Treasury if not otherwise disposed of. Therefore I say that this bill takes from the Treasury money which belongs to the United States and diverts it to a sinking fund for the benefit of mortgagees, whom the Government is to pay, though the mortgage when it becomes due may not be worth the paper on which it is written.

Mr. MORRISON. I think that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] is in error in saying that any money which now goes into the Treasury of the United States by the provisions of this bill will be paid into the sinking fund. Under the law as it now stands, the Government is to receive 5 per cent. of the net earnings and one-half of the cost of the carrying done for the Government. Now this bill does not provide that this one-half of the cost of service shall go into the sinking fund at all; nor does it provide that the 5 per cent. shall go into the sinking fund. But the one-half that is now paid to the Government, and the 5 per cent. are taken into consideration in making up the 25 per cent. The companies pay into the sinking fund only 25 per cent. after deducting what under existing law goes to the United States; and the Government continues to receive that sum.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman will allow me to call his attention to the provision of the bill in respect to one of these companies, the same provision being repeated as to the others:

That there shall be carried to the credit of the said fund, on the 1st day of February in each year, the one-half of the compensation for services hereinafter named, rendered for the Government by said Union Pacific Railroad Company, not applied in liquidation of interest; and, in addition thereto, the said company shall, on said day in each year, pay into the Treasury to the credit of said sinking fund, the sum of $300,000, or so much thereof as shall be necessary to make the 5 per cent. of the net earnings of its said road payable to the United States, under said act of 1862, and the whole sum earned by it as compensation for services rendered for the United States, together with the sum by this section required to be paid, amount in the aggregate to 25 per cent. of the whole net earnings of said railroad company, ascertained, and defined as hereinafter provided, for the year ending on the 31st day of December next preceding.

Mr. MORRISON. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. Not only the half of the compensation but 25 per cent. in addition must go into the sinking fund.

Mr. MORRISON. No, sir; only the half of the cost of carrying for the Government which the Government does not now receive is to go into the sinking fund. The other half which the Government now receives is only mentioned in the bill for the purpose of ascertaining what shall be the 25 per cent.

Mr. BUTLER. The language of the bill is, "shall be paid in."

Mr. MORRISON. As to the point the gentleman makes as to taking money belonging to the United States and putting it into the Treasury for the purpose of paying ultimately the first-mortgage bonds, this bill is constructed upon the hypothesis that the first mortgage is a prior lien and must be first paid; and further, that the money which we propose to compel the companies to pay into the sinking fund is not the money of the United States, and never will be until that first mortgage, which is a prior lien, is extinguished. If this money is required to discharge the first mortgage it should be first applied to that purpose, as that mortgage is first in right; when that is discharged the Government will have the first right. This is not the money of the Government; it is not intended to be the money of the Government until this other mortgage is discharged.

Mr. BUTLER. I respectfully submit, then, Mr. Speaker, we have nothing to do with it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to decide the point of order. [Cries of "Question!"] The Chair thinks that the rule upon which the gentleman from Massachusetts relies, that all proceedings touching the appropriation of money and all bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriations to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made, shall be first discussed in the Committee of the Whole, applies to public money, to public land, or to public property, and that, consequently, it does not apply to money coming into the Treasury of the United States in trust for purposes which are indicated. The rule evidently applies to public money going out of the Treasury. This bill in its general scope is to bring money into the Treasury of the United States for particular trust purposes, and therefore, in the opinion of the Chair, Rule 112, which has just been quoted, does not apply to it. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. BEEBE. Now let us have the previous question.

Mr. COX, of New York. I demand the previous question.

Mr. HASKELL. I rise for the purpose of asking a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HASKELL. Does the decision of the Chair, just made, cover the case where a trust fund in the hands of the Government is sought to be applied in a bill to any specific purpose?

The SPEAKER. The Chair, under the rule, is called only to decide upon questions before the House. He has decided the question raised upon the bill now pending. Whenever the case which the gentleman from Kansas may have in his mind comes up and the point of order is raised the Chair will rule upon it.

Mr. COX, of New York. I wish to ask a parliamentary question. If I call the previous question now will I be entitled to an hour after the main question has been ordered?

The SPEAKER. The rule provides only for the member reporting a measure to be heard after the previous question has been called. This bill is before the House for consideration, and as the gentleman has been recognized he is entitled to an hour if he chooses to take the floor for debate.

Mr. COX, of New York. Then I give notice that at the end of my hour I will demand the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. Under the rules is anybody entitled to debate a proposition after the previous question has been seconded and the main question ordered except the member reporting the measure?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has so decided, and such is the rule.

Mr. CONGER. How, then, does the gentleman from New York become entitled to the floor to debate this question for an hour?

The SPEAKER. By parliamentary courtesy the member upon whose motion a subject is brought before the House is first entitled to the floor, and as it was on the motion of the gentleman from New York the House went to the business upon the Speaker's table for the purpose of reaching the pending bill, the Chair has recognized him as first entitled to the floor.

Mr. CONGER. Does the rule apply to him as being entitled to an hour for debate after the previous question has been seconded?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York did not report this measure, and therefore is not entitled to an hour after the previous question has been seconded. But that is not the case here. He has sought the floor on the pending bill and is recognized by the Chair, and is entitled to be heard for an hour to debate the question before calling the previous question.

Mr. COX, of New York. And I give notice that at the close of my hour I shall demand the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. I do not object to an hour now before the previous question is called and seconded.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York would not be entitled to another hour after the previous question has been called, as he is not the reporter of the measure.

Mr. COX, of New York. I do not intend to occupy the whole of my hour.

The SPEAKER. The practice has been heretofore at times to test the sense of the House by making a demand for the previous question, and if the disposition of the House has been in favor of debate and the previous question has not been seconded, under the courtesy to which the Chair has referred the gentleman on whose motion the subject was brought before the House has been recognized.

Mr. BUTLER. How is the rule?

The SPEAKER. Only the reporter of a measure is entitled to an hour after the main question has been ordered. The gentleman from New York has an hour, the bill being under consideration.

Mr. COX, of New York. Very well; I will take my hour now and demand the previous question when I have concluded my remarks.

Mr. BUTLER. Will you divide the time with us?

Mr. COX, of New York. I intend to speak but a short time.

Mr. BEEBE. The gentleman says he will divide the time with you.

Mr. BUTLER. That is fair.

Mr. FRYE. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman from New York has moved to pass this bill in concurrence with the Senate, and on that demands the previous question. I wish to inquire of the Speaker whether or not under Rule 54 the demand for the previous question will cut me off from making the motion provided there, to commit to the Judiciary Committee, as I have been instructed to do by that committee?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will read Rule 42 he will find it provides that when a question is under debate no motion shall be received but to adjourn, to lie on the table, for the previous question, to postpone to a day certain, to commit or amend, to postpone indefinitely; which several motions shall have precedence in the order in which they are arranged. The rule is express on that subject.

Mr. FRYE. Under Rule 54, if the Chair pleases, to be found on page 112, will be found the order to be observed when the House goes to the business on the Speaker's table at the expiration of the morning hour. In the third place, under that rule, "that bills and resolutions from the Senate, on their first and second reading, be referred to committees and put under way," I think the motion to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary is clearly in order.

The SPEAKER. The rule goes on to provide "and if on reading a second time no motion being made to commit, they are to be ordered to their third reading, unless objection be made; in which case, if not otherwise ordered by a majority of the House," &c. The majority of the House can order otherwise; the majority of the House may refuse to second the demand for the previous question, and if the majority of the House does refuse to second the demand for the previous question the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Maine or any other gentleman to move to commit the bill.

Mr. FRYE. But does not the demand for the previous question cut off the motion to commit at this time?

The SPEAKER. If the demand for the previous question is seconded and the main question ordered, of course it will cut off the motion to commit.

Mr. FRYE. I ask the Speaker to read the first portion of article 3 under that rule. It is as follows:

3. Bills and resolutions from the Senate on their first and second reading, that they be referred to committees and put under way.

Is not that the first proposition, and does it not take priority over every other?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's view is that a motion to commit is first in order. The Chair thinks not. The Chair thinks that Rule 42 is clear and distinct on that subject, and that the reservation made even in the paragraph of Rule 54 to which the gentleman directs the attention of the Chair, "if not otherwise ordered by a majority of the House," agrees practically with the order given in Rule 42, the principle being that a majority of this House have a right to conduct their business in the manner they see fit and to dispose of a bill as they shall see fit when it is up for consideration.

Mr. FRYE. Then I ask the gentleman from New York to allow me a word in relation to that motion to commit.

Mr. COX, of New York. If it does not come out of my time. My time is limited and I have agreed to give half of it to the other side.

Mr. FRYE. I will not take two minutes.

Mr. COX, of New York. I will give the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. FRYE. The Judiciary Committee, nine members being present and voting, instructed me to make the motion to commit this bill to the Judiciary Committee. Two members were absent. Those two absent members have since informed me that they were opposed to the committing of the bill to the Judiciary Committee, so that if they had been present and voted the motion would not have been made here in pursuance of a majority vote of the committee. But, under the instruction which I received at the regular meeting of the committee, I deem it my duty and propose now, if the opportunity is at any time offered, to move to commit this bill to the Judiciary Committee.

The SPEAKER. That can be done, if the House desires, by voting down the previous question.

Mr. COX, of New York. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. McMAHON.]

Mr. McMAHON. I desire to state in that connection that the Committee on the Judiciary had previously determined that the gentleman from New York should be permitted to move to proceed to business on the Speaker's table and pass this bill, and that this was agreed to by a vote in the full committee. The action adopted by the vote the gentleman from Maine speaks of was at a time when no member of the committee had notice that this particular matter was coming up; and it is true, as has been stated, that a majority of the Judiciary Committee prefer this bill to be acted upon and passed here.

Mr. COX, of New York. I now yield for a moment to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HARTRIDGE.]

Mr. HARTRIDGE. I desire to make just one statement in addition to what my colleague on the committee has said. It is this: that four out of the nine who voted against this reference reserved to themselves the right to oppose the reference in the House.

Mr. COX, of New York. I now yield to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. KNOTT.]

Mr. KNOTT. I desire simply to say that during the last Congress I devoted a great deal of time to the consideration of this subject, and was then in favor of the passage of a bill substantially the same as the bill now pending, which I believe passed the House with but nine dissenting voices. I am in favor of passing the bill as it has come to us from the Senate, and so voted in committee.

Mr. COX, of New York. I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STENGER.]

Mr. STENGER. I desire to say in this connection that I have examined the bill fully as a member of the Judiciary Committee. I am one of those who favor taking it up and passing it without any delay whatever.

Mr. COX, of New York. I yield a moment to my colleague, [Mr. LAPHAM.]

Mr. LAPHAM. Although I am in favor of this bill and expect to vote for it whenever the question comes before the House, yet it is a bill of such magnitude and importance that I thought it should take the usual course of a reference to the Judiciary Committee, and I voted in the committee for the reference. I still hope it will be sent there by the House.

Mr. McMAHON. The trouble about the reference is this: if this bill is referred to the Judiciary Committee with the limited time now intervening between the probable call of that committee and the present time, the committee could probably give it no further consideration than they have already, and it would interfere with the other public business the committee has to consider.

Mr. CASWELL. I desire to remind the House that the Committee on the Pacific Railroad have had this same bill under consideration, and have agreed to and reported the same to this House.

Mr. CONGER. The other members on the Judiciary Committee having made their statements, if the gentleman from New York will yield to me I will make mine.

Mr. COX, of New York. I suppose all this comes out of my time; but I will yield for a moment to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. Several members of the Judiciary Committee have stated their desire that this bill be referred to them. While I am in favor of the passage of the bill, I felt, as some others did, that it should have the consideration of the Judiciary Committee, and asked it be referred. But if that should delay or jeopardize the passage of the bill, I certainly do not care to have it referred.

Mr. COX, of New York. The House is in no sense responsible for any delay in passing this bill. We were about to reach it by a summary method when the Senate concurrent resolution for adjournment reached us. By the rules that resolution, being on the Speaker's table, had priority of this measure. An unscrupulous lobby had delayed action for years. It was not the fault of the popular branch, for the Lawrence bill, even more stringent than this, had passed the House in the last Congress. If we are to believe what is reported as to the lobby and what our own eyes have seen, the most impudent attempt ever made to prevent legislation on this subject has been persisted in up to this hour.

It was not and is not necessary to refer this bill to any committee. The committees which have jurisdiction of such subjects have already agreed to its provisions. It will be found, I trust, that the methods by which railroads have been stolen, watered, and gutted through the tameness or corruption of other Legislatures will not prevail now and here. Even yet we are threatened that, if this bill passes, the Supreme Court will be found pliable enough to nullify it in the interest of stock-jobbers and monopolists.

The dictation of railway kings may assume that Congress which created them is attempting to intrench upon their private property and corporate franchises; but, sir, no amount of money is compensation enough for this Government for allowing corporate irresponsibility. There is not money enough represented by the public debt to pay for the imminence of the danger to our institutions if we suffer such corporations not only to enrich wrongfully the few who control them, but to become masters of the people. One of these magnates boasted that he could win his way by electing his agents by corruption at the polls at less cost than at the seat of government. It has been his boast that even our best Senators had their price. Gentlemen should remember the uprising of last summer, when ten millions of people arose under a wild sense of injustice. It was a terrible protest against partial legislation, corporate chicanery, and over-reaching greed.

Our railways should be managed in harmony with commercial, industrial, and public interests. No reserved power of legislation should be given away which lessens or destroys this power either by compromise, inaction, or indifference.

Plausible attempts were made to turn over to the United States twelve millions of acres of the land it had given to propitiate opposition and make a fair-seeming compromise. The attempt was a failure.

A bill of this nature which passed this House last Congress had no party aspect. It reached into the higher equities, where no party lash could reach. It is very clear that under this bill the Government may be secured, and still there will remain assets and profits sufficient to cover the stock rightly computed and pay handsome dividends upon that stock at its real value.

This bill is important in the sums, interests, and questions involved. It involves $120,000,000 at simple interest, and more—$170,000,000—if the interest is compounded. It involves the public interests connected with the transportation between two oceans. It comprehends a trust of unexampled magnitude. It is bound up with the question of the power of Congress to restrain and control its great railroad creatures—corporate franchises of gigantic proportions. In its consideration we consider lands by the million of acres and money by the million of dollars. The East India Company, the Hudson Bay Company, and other great artificial bodies known to history are the only illustrations with which adequately to compare these enormous monsters of legislative creation, and yet England dealt with them summarily. These questions have been before us for two years. They have been thoroughly discussed; they are well understood. We should not hesitate to grasp promptly from the Speaker's table this bill so honorable to the Senate, and make secure the vast sums invested by the United States.

From the Senate report of 4th of March last we learn the magnitude of the sums and interests involved. It appears that the Government loaned the Union Pacific $27,236,512. On this the Government has paid as interest $15,969,801. Deduct from these sums added—the interest repaid by half transportation and the balance due the Government January 31, 1878, exclusive of interest on interest, is $38,071,985. These figures are not denied. They are authentic. The annual interest paid by the Government is $1,634,190. There is a prior mortgage of about the same as the Government debt, with interest on this prior lien to the amount of $1,634,190. The total funded indebtedness of this company is $78,733,712. I need not indicate the nature of this indebtedness. It includes a floating debt of less than a million. It can easily be paid. So of the land-grant debt, as is abundantly shown by the government directors' report, (p. 821.) The average net receipts of this road, according to the Attorney-General's mode of computation, is $6,547,149. But the companies endeavor, by a forced and selfish construction, to construe the net earnings to be what is left after paying all its debts and obligations.

This is a flagrant violation of the sixth section of the act of 1862. At any rate, as will be seen, Congress has the right to determine for the future what are net earnings. In determining that, we deduct in future the operating expenses and interest on the first mortgage. Taking the average net earnings of the past four years this interest and the 5 per cent. would be only $245,661. The right to this should not and cannot be gainsaid. So, too, of the pay for Government services, the half of the average for six years per annum was $421,311.87. It will increase. On page 5 of the Senate report the statement is made that after paying all the interest and the other half of the transportation service there will be left a dividend of 6½ per cent. of the present market price of the stock, while the United States will get the sum of $1,938,283. This would sink the principal annually only $304,092. Is this a harsh proceeding toward shareholders or the companies?

By similar computation as to the Central Pacific, about the same sum is to be paid into the fund. It is made up on page 8 of the report, at $1,900,000. This, too, will leave handsome dividends for the stockholders. Why, this company has made 10 per cent. dividend on the nominal amount of their stock. After paying into the sinking fund, there will be still 6½ per cent. dividend on the nominal stock.

Who can complain of any severity in this law? Does the sinking fund do any one injustice, unless it be the United States? It is a sinking fund for all the creditors, and not of the Government alone. It changes no relation of other creditors to the fund. It would act as a chancellor, and marshal the assets and distribute them according to the equities. If the bill becomes a law it enhances the value of the first-mortgage bonds, which are preferred to the United States debt, for it gives them additional security. It is in other respects favorable to the roads. When in any one year 75 per cent. of the net earnings will not be sufficient to pay all the operating expenses and the interest on the first mortgage, an abatement may be made. In no event will more than 25 per cent. be required for that year; neither from the half-transportation account nor the 5 per cent.

The Senate report shows that the companies can pay all the interest to both preferred and inferior creditors, and all expenses, and have dividends for shareholders larger than any other railroads in the United States. They have little floating debt, and as things now go with them they will be richer in money, mines, and franchises than any railroads or corporations ever constituted. The eleventh section gives them time, in case of default, to make good their payments, and is not a harsh provision. Nor is it illiberal in regard to net earnings. As that question as to past earnings is before the courts, the bill accepts the wrong construction of the companies, and seeks only to define the net earnings of the future. Nor is it illiberal as to interest, for it does not compound; and thereby, whatever the right of the Government to interest on interest, the right is not claimed by this bill.

It is not a hard measure on these corporations to require them to make a sinking fund as prescribed by section 6 of the act of 1862. Not a dollar due the Government has been paid. This bill does not compel payment, as it might. It compels the net profits, not as defined by the companies, but as we all know it means—to be laid away in a sinking fund—as security; so that in 1898 the means shall be ready to save the Government from all loss by reason of speculations, insolvency, or other hazards with which the few owners of these roads may becloud or dissipate these properties.

But we are met with the question of reserved power. It would seem that nothing but the enormous private interests adverse to public rights could so distort the meaning of the laws of 1862 and 1864 as to make them irrevocable. No impartial man, or good lawyer, or honest judge, can doubt for a moment the power of Congress to amend or repeal such laws. It is asserted expressly in section 22 of the act of 1864. There is no question as to our right to add to, amend, or repeal these statutes.

The Supreme Court, in (1 Otto, 350) Union Pacific Railroad Company vs. Hall, held that the acts of 1862 and 1864 were to be taken together. But there is nothing in the act of 1864 to abridge, and much to strengthen, the eighteenth section of the act of 1862. It has been seriously argued that the unqualified reserved power to alter, amend, and repeal a charter does not carry with it a power to take away the possession, use, enjoyment, and proceeds of the property from the corporation. In other words, that when power is reserved it is no power at all; that rights are vested beyond the power to control, even when that very power to reserve was a part of the charter. A mere statement of such a non sequitur is sufficient to show its sophistry. An unlimited power to amend is held to be limited according to the wishes and interests of those who desire no limitation. I hold that under the power reserved we may make new rules to capture, seize, ay, confiscate these roads; and it is not for the roads to set up any estoppel upon Congress, as the giver of the grants and the dictator of its uses forever. It is sovereignty; not to be abridged or despoiled.

Mr. Jefferson laid down the general proposition in his letter to Madison on the question "whether one generation could bind another?" No society can make perpetual law. The earth belongs to the living. Jeremy Bentham has enforced this principle with invincible sense and logic. But does our Constitution guard these roads against alteration of their charter? Certainly not. The charter was granted under that instrument and is still under it. There is no impediment but our own legislative negative, and that is within our control. Whether the terms of the laws of 1862 or 1864 allowed amendment or not, the right is as indestructible as society.

England has compelled the repeal of charters in the public interest—compelled. Massachusetts, Ohio, and other States have substantially reserved that power. We did the same in our banking law; and in 1870 we exercised the expressed reserved right to cut down the circulation, and without saying "by your leave" to the banks. No one can doubt, who reads the decisions quoted on pages 9, 10, and 11 of the Senate report, the principle that one Congress cannot limit the constitutional power of a subsequent Congress.

Ah! but it is claimed that it is sheer oppression and wrong to impair the grant by amendment and that they cannot be inflicted under the guise of alteration. Oppression to secure one's own! Wrong to exercise the power to make a generous Government safe in its investment! One looks in vain for such insolence and impudence outside of these pampered, law-defying, press-subsidizing, lobby-employing corporations, who for private ends disregard the public good. Who is to judge of the general welfare—the corporations or the conserving power of the Legislature? Are we to be limited in our regulation of these roads to the postal and military purposes, as to which these roads are specifically bound to render service? Why, if it be confessed that for such purposes we are bound to see these roads run honestly and run on forever, why may we not, by securing it against insolvency and even seizing the properties, assure the execution of these postal and military provisions?

I ask on this legal question to insert the report made on this subject from the report No. 459 Forty-fourth Congress first session:

Your committee entertain no doubt of the power of Congress to pass this bill. By the eighteenth section of said act of July 1, 1862, it is declared that—

"The better to accomplish the object of this act, namely, to promote the public interest and welfare by the construction of said railroad and telegraph line, and keeping the same in working order, and to secure to the Government at all times (but particularly in time of war) the use and benefits of the same for postal, military, and other purposes, Congress may at any time, having due regard for the rights of said companies named herein, add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act."

It has been said that this is a very limited power to alter or amend the act, and that the act only authorizes the alteration or amendment in order to promote the construction of the railroad and telegraph line and keeping the same in working order, and to secure to the Government at all times (and particularly in time of war) the use and benefits of the same for postal, military, and other purposes. Were this limited interpretation placed on the reservation, it would not, in the opinion of your committee, defeat the bill they report. For, although said roads and telegraph lines have been constructed, yet it is manifest, having reference to their pecuniary condition, that some such measure as that now recommended is necessary in order to keep them in working order, and to secure to the Government at all times the use and benefits of the same. It needs no argument to prove that insolvent railroad corporations, or corporations in danger of insolvency, cannot be relied upon to furnish the Government the benefits contemplated by said act. In view of the liberal aid afforded by the Government to said companies, the objects to be attained by the construction of said railroad and telegraph lines, and the general principle of interpretation of corporate grants of power, your committee are of the opinion that the reservation of a right to add to, alter, or amend the said act ought to be liberally construed for the public benefit.

But whatever may be thought of the reserved right to alter, amend, or repeal in the act of 1862, it cannot be denied that the right reserved in the amendatory act of July 2, 1864, is as broad as words can make it.

Section 22 of this act is as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That Congress may at any time alter, amend, or repeal this act."

It has been argued that this right applies only to the act of 1864, and does not authorize any alteration or amendment of the act of 1862. Were this so, it would not defeat the bill of your committee, for it might well be sustained as an amendment to the act of 1864. But when the circumstances of the case are considered, when it is remembered that nothing had been done toward actual construction of said railroads under the act of 1862 and before the act of 1864, that the grants to the railroad companies named in the first act were greatly enlarged by the latter act, that the roads and telegraph lines have been constructed under the provisions of the two acts, and that those provisions were almost inseparably interwoven, it seems to your committee that said acts should be considered as in pari materia—as constituting for purposes of interpretation but one act, and that, consequently, the power to alter, amend, or repeal, reserved in the act of 1864, which is the last expression of the legislative will, applies to both said acts.

What, then, is the power thus reserved, that is to say, the general power to alter, amend, or repeal the charter?

It was defined by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Tomlinson vs. Jessup (15 Wallace, 458) as follows:

"The power reserved to the State by the law of 1841 authorized any change in the contract as it originally existed, or as subsequently modified, or its entire revocation. The original corporators or subsequent stockholders took their interests with knowledge of the existence of this power and of the possibility of its exercise at any time in the discretion of the Legislature."

"The object of the reservation, and of similar reservations in other charters, is to prevent a grant of corporate rights and privileges in a form which will preclude legislative interference with their exercise, if the public interest should at any time require such interference. It is a provision intended to preserve to the State control over its contract with the corporators, which without that provision would be irrevocable, and protected from any measures affecting its obligation."

This decision places the reservation upon its true ground. It gives to the Legislature the right to interfere when the public interests require interference. It preserves to the State control over its contract with the corporators, and the latter, by accepting the charter, agree in advance that such control shall exist. No one will deny that, if the bill now reported should become a law and be assented to by said railroad corporations, it would thenceforth be binding upon them. But their acceptance of their charter, containing the reservations aforesaid, is an assent beforehand to the bill now proposed, or to any similar measure that Congress in its discretion shall deem necessary for the protection of the Government or the creditors of said corporations. (Pa. College cases, 13 Wallace, 213 and 214.) In this latter case the court spoke of the reserved right to alter or amend a charter as a "reservation to the State to make any alterations in the charter which the Legislature in its wisdom may deem fit, just, and expedient to enact."

In the case of Sherman vs. Smith (1 Black, 593) the Supreme Court of the United States seem to recognize a right in the Legislature, when the power to alter or amend a charter is reserved, to add to the liabilities of the stockholders. They said:

"Another view of this question, even assuming that the stipulation of the stockholders in the article of association amounted to a contract, is equally conclusive against the stockholders."

"According to the fifteenth section the association was authorized to establish a bank of discount, deposit, and circulation upon the terms and conditions and subject to the liabilities prescribed in this act. It was not competent for the association to organize their bank upon any other terms or conditions or subject to any other liabilities than those prescribed in the general charter. Now, the thirty-second section, which reserved to the Legislature the power to alter or repeal the act, by necessary construction reserved the power to alter or repeal all or any one of these terms and conditions or rules of liability prescribed in the act. The articles of association are dependent upon and become a part of the law under which the bank was organized, and subject to alteration and repeal, the same as any other part of the general system."

In Miller vs. The State (15 Wallace, 498) the Supreme Court said:

"Power to legislate, founded upon such a reservation in a charter to a private corporation, is certainly not without limit, and it may well be admitted that it cannot be exercised to take away or destroy rights acquired by virtue of such charter, and which by a legitimate use of the powers granted have become vested in the corporation; but it may be safely affirmed that the reserved power may be exercised, and to almost any extent, to carry into effect the original purposes of the grant or to secure the due administration of its affairs so as to protect the rights of its stockholders and of creditors and for the proper disposition of the assets."

In Holyoke vs. Lyman (15 Wallace, 500) the court held that—

"The provision of the Revised Statutes of Massachusetts, chapter 44, section 23, and General Statutes, chapter 68, section 41, declaring that acts of incorporation shall be subject to amendment, alteration, or repeal, at the pleasure of the Legislature, reserves to the Legislature the authority to make any alteration or amendment of a charter granted subject to it, which will not defeat or substantially impair the object of the grant or any rights vested under it, and which the Legislature may deem necessary to secure either that object or other public or private rights."

Many decisions of the State courts might be referred to to the same effect, but it is unnecessary to cite them here. A number of them are cited in Report No. 440 of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives at the present session. Your committee would also refer to that report for many important and valuable facts and tables relating to the subject under consideration.

If there was any room for doubt as to the power of Congress when that report was made, it has been completely removed by decisions of the Supreme Court since made in the following cases: Munn vs. Illinois, 4 Otto, 113; C. B. and Q. R. R. Co. vs. Iowa, 36, 135; Peik vs. C. and N. W. R. R., 30, 164; C. M. and St. P. R. R. Co. vs. Ackley, 36, 179; Winona and St. Peter R. R. Co. vs. Blake, 36, 180; and Stone vs. Wisconsin, 36, 181.

Being fully satisfied that Congress, under the reserved right to alter, amend, or repeal the charter of these companies, possesses the right to pass this bill, we do not consider it necessary to say what would be the case were that reservation not in the charter. Had it been omitted, it might still be argued with much force that the power to alter, amend, or repeal legally existed. No State can make a law impairing the obligation of a contract, because that is prohibited by the Federal Constitution.

Because, Mr. Speaker, Congress has given imperial largesses for public purposes, it does not follow that Congress has not reserved her power to control. Otherwise, what consequences would follow? The answer to this is found in the judicious and judicial reasoning contained in the cogent extracts from the Senate report. The committee appointed in 1873 reported that such power existed. The best legal minds have so decided. How, then, shall the power be exercised?

The action of Congress by this bill may not give us all we should have to save public interests; but it does assert unmistakably that no consolidated power liable to be perverted and already perverted, already in full force here in the lobby, and subsidizing the press with venal and selfish devices, seeking political and worse objects with brazen audacity, that such power shall not be used for mere private or selfish purposes, at the expense of a forbearing and distressed people.

The grants of Congress were for grand, public, continental objects. Let us rescue them while we can. If this bill does not effectuate the object and make the Treasury secure, let us find supplemental means that will do it.

It is a contest between the brawn of this country aided at last by honest brain, and those speculators who have failed in a great trust. I hope Congress will not fail to distinguish where brawn and brain are, and where the corrupt speculation, where the general, commercial, industrial, national, and international interests are, and where the monopolizing and consolidating schemes are, and legislate accordingly.

Mr. HARTRIDGE. I had desired to discuss at some length the question involved in this bill, presenting as they do grave and serious questions not only of material interests and practical purposes, but of legal and constitutional points. But in the few moments which my friend's courtesy allows me I should be unable to do justice to the subject or to myself, and I shall therefore ask the permission of the House to print my remarks and shall confine myself to the simple announcement that I am opposed to the reference of this bill, believing that the people at large through the discussion of it elsewhere have received all the light they desire upon the subject, and that there is hardly a member upon the floor who has not made up his mind how he shall act in regard to it. Under these circumstances, I am opposed to the reference of the bill and am in favor of its immediate passage.

Mr. COX, of New York. I yield now five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. PHILLIPS.]

Mr. PHILLIPS. I rise to say but a few words. I hope the previous question will be sustained upon the bill, and that it will not be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, for the reason that at this stage of the session every experienced member of the House knows that if the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary it is equivalent to saying that we shall not vote upon it at this session. The bill in brief is a measure to provide for securing the interests of the United States in the amount invested in this road. The Government advanced to the company upon its bond to the extent of $27,500,000. They authorized, by law, the company to issue first-mortgage bonds which came in before the bond held by the United States for the same amount. In addition to this the Union Pacific Railway Company have added to it of bonded debts of various kinds some twenty-two millions more. It was provided that when this company should do the transportation for the Government it should repay to the Government half of all such amounts in payment, or to reimburse it for paying the interest which the Government pays annually upon its bonds.

Every one is familiar with the fact that the company has not paid the amount so required. The company has built it at a nominal cost much greater than the real cost, and has multiplied expenses and run in debt so as to prevent the United States Government from ever recovering any part of the money thus expended. In the report made to the Senate upon this subject I find that if the company was managed with rigid economy the Government is entitled to expect the interest would be paid upon the first-mortgage bond and also upon the bond guaranteed by the Government, and there would still be 4½ per cent. left to pay the interest on the stock at its nominal value, and 6½ per cent. per annum on its real value. It is very well known that this company has multiplied its expenditure, that it has so managed its business that if it were permitted to be carried on as it now is a debt of one hundred and fifty millions would be entailed and the Government would realize nothing of what is justly due to it.

This bill is in substance simply a measure by which the United States may step in, which by law it has a right to do through the provisions of the charter which gives Congress the right to alter, amend, or repeal, to provide that the road shall be so economically and honestly managed that the United States shall be so reimbursed in some degree at least. In the name of every just and legitimate enterprise we are called on to see that there is no sacrifice of the just interests of the Government and no sacrifice of the money of the people. Corporations have too long acted defiantly of law, and it is time they should be placed under its just restrictions. The bill is therefore eminently just; it is one that we as representatives of the people are called upon to vote for; it is one that will not cripple the road, if there is any fair effort to manage the road honestly and economically, and I hope the House will speedily pass it. It has been carefully considered by the Senate Judiciary Committee, a body of eminent lawyers; has been before Congress before, and I hope that its opponents will not shelter themselves by motions of delay. The unanimity of support it received by the Senate, and which I hope it will receive in the House, is one of the wholesome evidences that the power of corporations over legislators no longer exists.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to put a question to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Cox.]

Mr. COX, of New York. I will hear it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I conceive that it is exceedingly important that a sinking fund for paying the indebtedness of these roads to the Government should be established. There is a great danger that spoliation and waste may come if we wait for the maturity of the bonds; but the thing I want to ask of any gentleman who may speak is this: are we sure that the bill here drafted and now before us is one that will stand the pressure of the courts and accomplish its object? I desire information on that point. We have had great misfortune in our legislation heretofore in this respect. I believe the United States has been beaten in almost every appeal to the courts in the legislation that we have passed in the attempt to limit and restrict the power of these roads and to protect the interests of the United States.

Now I desire very much that some gentleman who has studied this bill, as I have not, shall say to the House clearly, and give the grounds for it, that this bill is in a shape where we can safely trust the cause of the United States in the courts.

To make sure of this it seems to me that it would be safer to refer the bill to our Law Committee, with authority to report it back at any time; and unless that committee has considered the question and made up its mind that the bill will meet the objects we desire to reach, it ought to be so referred. But if it will secure the objects set out in its provisions, and secure them by means of the courts, then this bill should certainly receive the approval of a majority of this House. That is the simple question which I desire to ask.

I desire to say now that I am paired with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] during his absence; and as I do not know how he would vote on this bill if he were present, I shall withhold my vote.

Mr. COX, of New York. I do not intend to take up any time in reply to the question of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] except to say that eminent lawyers of the Senate, including an ex-judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, have stated that they thought this bill would hold water in any court. I will not set up my legal opinion after the opinion which has been given.

Now as to the disposal of the time. I propose to hold the last ten minutes for this side of the House, and will yield twenty minutes to gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. BUTLER. Pardon me; no man has spoken against your proposition yet that I have heard, and I agreed with you that those opposed to passing the bill at this time should be allowed thirty minutes.

Mr. PRICE. I ask to be allowed five minutes on this bill.

Mr. COX, of New York. I was about to say—

Mr. BUTLER. If we are to be allowed half an hour—

Mr. COX, of New York. I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] one-half of the hour, if he will settle the question with gentlemen on that side of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. VANCE.) There are only thirty minutes of the hour remaining.

Mr. BUTLER. Exactly; that is all I want.

Mr. COX, of New York. A great deal of the first half of the hour was taken up by preliminary discussion.

Mr. BUTLER. I hope that every one will consent that ten minutes additional be given to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Cox.]

Mr. BEEBE. I ask unanimous consent that the time for debate be extended ten minutes, so that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] will have thirty minutes, and that ten minutes be allowed to my colleague, [Mr. Cox.] And I give notice that I shall object to any further extension of the time after that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That requires unanimous consent.

No objection was made, and the time was extended accordingly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] is recognized as entitled to the floor for thirty minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE.]

Mr. PRICE. I have very little to say in reference to this bill. I will commence by saying that if the bill comes to a vote in its present shape I shall vote for it; but I shall regret very much being compelled to do so, for the reason that I have examined this bill carefully again, and again, and I undertake to say now without fear of successful contradiction that the fourth and fifth sections of this bill can be interpreted to mean two diametrically different things. If they shall become law they will open the door for just such litigation as we have had in the courts in years past in regard to these corporations. For that reason I thought and still think that this bill should go to the Committee on the Judiciary to be examined in reference to these matters so as to make the language of those two sections free of the ambiguity that now certainly attaches to it.

Gentlemen upon this floor know full well without my saying it that we are brought every now and then face to face with a proposition upon which we are compelled to cast our votes, and there is very great doubt in the minds of many gentlemen upon this floor how those votes should be cast. It is not a singular thing; but very frequently men on both sides of this Chamber are compelled by the rules of the House to vote upon a proposition when they are not certain whether the votes they give are in accordance with right and justice or not.

Now, I do not want to delay action on this bill. I am as anxious as any other gentleman upon this floor to get through with the legislation that is pressing upon us and to adjourn this Congress. And if the bill was right, or as near right as it could be made in my judgment, I should say that we should vote upon the bill as it is.

But believing as I do that it ought to have consideration by the Committee on the Judiciary, particularly in regard to the two sections to which I have referred, I must vote against the previous question so as to obtain a commitment of this bill. I might say in the language of another, familiar to us all, "if it were done, when 'tis done, then 'twere well it were done quickly." But the fear with me is that when we have done this it will not be the "be-all and end-all" of the matter, but it will come up in the courts in the future as in the past, especially in regard to these two sections.

Now, I make this prophecy, and I want gentlemen to mark it: if this bill shall pass in its present shape, I will risk all the judgment I possess upon railroad matters, and all the ability I have upon any question, that it will in the future, as it has in the past, give rise to litigation. For that reason and that reason alone I want this bill committed to the Committee on the Judiciary, so that they may examine these two sections particularly, and take from them the ambiguity and uncertainty which I believe is now in them, and give us a bill about which there will be no question; so that the Government will know what it has, the railroad companies will know what they have to do, and there will be no ground for litigation in the future upon these points.

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope my friend from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE,] if he has time, will point out the ambiguity of which he speaks, so that we may know what he means.

Mr. PRICE. The ambiguity is simply that sections 4 and 5, particularly section 4, are liable to two interpretations in reference to the sinking fund, in reference to the 5 per cent. and the half that is due from the road and the 25 per cent. No man can tell whether that provision means one thing or another. I have not time, in my five minutes, to go into a detailed statement; if I had half an hour I might do so.

It has been urged as an objection to the reference of this measure that the Judiciary Committee will not have an opportunity to report it. Sir, that committee, judging from the course of business in this House during the last two weeks, will probably be called within the next two weeks. There are only about three committees ahead of them after the Committee on Commerce shall have concluded its reports. The Judiciary Committee will have ample time to examine the bill and report it back on the regular call of the committee, and no interest can suffer from this delay.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire the ear of the House for the few minutes I have to speak. I shall not undertake to discuss the provisions of the bill. In the other branch of Congress it was discussed for weeks with great ability on the one side and on the other; but it was a discussion of generalities; there was no discussion such as this House gives to a measure when considering a bill section by section under the five-minute rule. I add my prediction to that of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE,] that this bill will not "hold water." The very men who drew it up were fearful that it would not "hold water," for they undertake to fix by legislation what the court shall do and how it shall decide. If I were a judge and such legislation came before me, I would say, "The legislative and the judicial departments of this Government are independent; the legislative department cannot legislate as to what the judiciary shall do or say." If that can be done the judiciary is gone. Observe this provision:

It shall be the duty of the court to determine the very right of the matter, without regard to matters of form, joinder of parties, multifariousness, or other matters not affecting the substantial rights and duties arising out of the matters and acts hereinbefore stated and referred to.

"Joinder of parties!" In other words, the court, in making a decision which may affect the rights of citizens or of the Government to the extent of millions, shall not see to it that proper parties are before the court. If the proper party is not before the court, the court is still by this bill ordered to go on and make adjudication without reference to that fact. Well, sir, unless the action of last winter has debased and debauched the Supreme Court far below what I believe it is and ought to be and ever has been, that court will throw this legislation back in your faces and say, "You cannot control our judgment by legislative direction; it is your part jus dare, it is ours jus dicere; you may make the law, but we must determine under the Constitution its construction, and to determine the rights of parties under the law, when, and when only, the party to be affected by our decision is properly before us."

But this is not for discussion now. It will be remembered that I stood here a short time ago one of an overwhelming majority of this House in the matter of the remonetization of silver and demanded that the House should consider that bill for itself. A panic had then seized the majority as it has now, and they would not listen to a single amendment or even to a consideration of the bill. The cry was, "Let us take what we can get now, and get what we can afterward." To that majority of three-fourths I said, "Let us stop and consider; this is the only bill we shall pass on the subject; let us get it as perfect as human ingenuity and human learning can make it, so that it may be a measure of relief to the financial distress of the people." But my appeal was in vain. Although the bill had been passed under a suspension of the rules in the House without debate, it was urged that it had been debated in the Senate, and that the Senate had got it just right. So men rushed like sheep over a wall, but without a leader, for they had no leader—rushed to make that silver bill a law. But, "like Dead Sea fruit which tempts the eye, it turns to ashes on your lips." The silver bill is not worth, for the purpose for which it was passed, the paper on which it is printed. By the Senate amendments to that bill all the relief to the people promised them by Congress to be given them by the bill was struck out.

Again, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] who is so anxious now to pass this bill without a word of debate except what he has written out and printed, occupied the time of the House all day yesterday to argue a bill after it was passed—to kick a dead horse—and his thesis was the danger of passing a bill involving $7,000,000 without debate. Yet he tells us that this bill involves $150,000,000, and we are not to debate it at all, for an hour's debate is naught; in that time members cannot even read the bill. Now I will venture to say, and I put it to the conscience of each man here, there is not a man of you that knows what is in that Senate bill that you are going to vote upon.

Mr. MORRISON. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. BUTLER. I am quite sure that I am nearly right. Gentlemen here do not spoil their eyes by reading written documents, and this bill has not been printed as it lies now on your table. I ask no man to accuse himself before the House, but how many of you have read that long written bill? There may be two or three, but I should be willing to be stoned by each of you who would get up and on your honor aver that you had read the bill on the Speaker's table, just as it stands, every word of it. I think I should be the safest man in the House.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. You have the "bricks" in your hat; we have not any.

Mr. BUTLER. Precisely so. But there are no "bricks" hard enough to throw at those who are in such a hurry to pass this bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask gentlemen to pause for another reason. I cannot discuss this bill. I should vote for some sinking-fund bill. I believe in dealing with this question. I believe in the right of Congress to deal with questions about these roads within certain limits; and I do not know but that this bill is within those limits. But I was amazed, nay, I was more than amazed, I was shocked, when I heard the learned and eloquent gentleman from New York, speaking of the railroad riots of last summer, say that they involved the loss of some $10,000,000, the result of the "wild justice of the people." Gentlemen, do you follow that lead? Do you say that a strike which was organized by train hands of the railroads, because they were deprived of their fair wages for their labor, and was carried out finally by others in robbery, rapine, arson, murder, and death—destroying not only railroads but other property—do you agree that such acts are the "wild justice of the people," or only spoliation and robbery? And are you acting under the spur of that occasion in depriving these railroads of their property?

I do not agree to another thing which the gentleman has said, that Congress has the right to proceed "even to confiscation" of the property of these roads under the words "alter, amend, and repeal" a charter. None of your property is safe under such an interpretation. And here we are, without consideration, without reference of this question to the appropriate committee, about to pass upon these grave questions; true this Pacific Railroad Committee say they have examined it while upon the Speaker's table, but I am certain they examined it with clean hands, for if you look at the paper on which the bill is written you will not find a single finger-mark where they have turned over the leaves; but they say they have examined it.

Mr. DICKEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a single question?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, if it be not long.

Mr. DICKEY. It will not be a long question.

Mr. BUTLER. Very well, go on.

Mr. DICKEY. As I understand it, you are in favor of some measure requiring the settlement of this indebtedness.

Mr. BUTLER. I am.

Mr. DICKEY. Does not the gentleman believe these roads will litigate any measure Congress may pass, and delay and fight us in every effort to make them come to a settlement?

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman's question, when resolved to its simple elements, is this: Do I believe these roads belong to men who act from selfish motives? Yes, I do.

Mr. DICKEY. So that any action on the part of Congress will be litigated by them and defeated if possible?

Mr. BUTLER. I should think it would. I believe it would, and if you had seen Congress as they have seen Congress year by year pass laws which when brought before the Supreme Court were decided to be utter nullities, you would be encouraged as they to keep on litigating the laws passed against them in the same way for the future. When they see Congress pass a law involving money, millions of property, without even referring it for revision to so poor a committee as the one I have the honor to be on, I should advise them, if they ask me to do that, to litigate this law, because we have never considered it; no one in the House knows anything about it; no one even debated it. I should not say there were ten men in the House who read the bill. There were not ten lawyers who read the bill at the time they voted on it, and they knew nothing of what was in it. And were I the court, when I came to consider it as a judge I would say we are not to attach much weight to the provisions of this bill, as it was passed without debate or consideration, it was passed without examination by the law committee of the House, as it was passed in the Senate on general debate only; therefore we are at liberty to use our own judgment as judges about it.

Do you want to vote this bill, as you are called on to do, as an act of "wild justice and confiscation"? Are these roads open to that? There are a great many things which can be objected against them. They are very open to objection and many of their acts are not well, but no such penalties as these can by you be enforced upon them. But it is objected they have paid no money into the United States Treasury, in accordance with their charter. Why? Because the Supreme Court of the United States said there was no clause in the act by which they should pay anything. Do you expect anybody, railroad men or others, to pay money that is not due under their contract, and which the United States courts say is not due? You say now they shall pay it in. That you perhaps may do. But what I say now is this, and I tell you, gentlemen, what I want: I want, if possible, to have a bill you cannot drive a coach-and-four through in double harness. That is the kind of bill I wish. The best legal minds in this House—and there are some as good on the other side of the House I know, for I have met them, as there are in the land—I want their examination of a bill to adjust its provisions so that litigation may be avoided. Something was said about this bill having been examined in the Judiciary Committee. It was never read in the Judiciary Committee, and no session of the committee was ever held in which its provisions were discussed for an hour—not for a moment. Therefore we stand here without any examination of the bill. What is the use of us two hundred and eighty men if we are to vote a bill just as the Senate send it to us? Where is the old democratic pride for the independence of the House against the property-representative body, the Senate? You lie down before them, and a republican Senate, too, like whipped spaniels whenever they pass a bill. They sent you a silver bill and you gobbled it up as a duck would a frog. [Laughter.] They send you a funding bill and you jump at it as if you answered the dictate of your candidate for the Presidency.

Now, then, I want to say a word about those Pacific roads. As I have said they are human institutions, but this country owes them a debt of gratitude even if they should run away to-morrow with all they have received. I know some of you on the other side do not feel that debt of gratitude as strongly as I do; but in 1862 the future of the country was a little dark up here, and it was still darker on the southern border. A cloud no bigger than a man's hand was rising in the West. The doubt was whether California and the Pacific States would not come to think it best to set up for themselves an empire on the western ocean, and, as a war measure, as a measure to bind this country together with chains of iron and hooks of steel, we passed a Union Pacific Railroad bill, and a Central Pacific Railroad bill, and gave this Pacific Railroad endowments out of our Treasury when the very life-blood and treasure of the country was pouring out like water. We did it as a war measure to bind the North together from ocean to ocean, and it was a very successful measure. We did it to show you, my friends on the other side, that we meant business, and that we could carry on this Government and preserve our work with one hand and fight you with the other besides. We did it for the same reason that, when taxes were piling up on us—step by step, up, up, up—we went on with the building of this Capitol, appropriating year by year a half million of money; although we needed every dollar for war purposes and our currency had gone down to thirty cents on the dollar, we still steadily piled up the stones of these wings of the Capitol, in one of which I am now speaking, although the war was going on. And why? To show you that we meant business and that we felt ourselves strong enough to build a road to connect two oceans and build a Capitol which should be more grand and magnificent than any other public building of its kind on the surface of the earth.

Now is it possible that, without any thought or consciousness on the part of a portion of you, enmity—hostility will be a better word, want of confidence a better word still, for I do not mean to say anything harsh—toward these roads may arise from a little feeling about these roads being built at that time out of that money, the proceeds of the public lands, and would now in part be yours, and these roads are of no use to you? Do not you southern gentlemen want me to vote for a Texas Pacific road so as to make this matter equal for your section? I shall anyhow, whether you vote this bill down or not, because I go for fair play now that you are back with us. We gave away part of the public lands for this road and I am willing to give part of the public lands for the other. I mean to be fair if I know how. I wish to act with all fairness and justice. But I say look into your heart of hearts and see if part of your hostility against these roads is not your determination to crush even to confiscation the property of these roads. The managers of this have been too shrewd to put forward anybody from the South to say that; nobody down South talked about the "wild justice" of the people when depots were burned and men were murdered; but I say is it not the fact that a part of the hostility arises because the building of these roads was the most efficient of all the most efficient instruments in binding this country together at a time when everything seemed to go asunder? Now, why treat this great measure differently from what you would any other measure? Why not let it be examined? There is no such haste about it. You have got a majority. What do we ask? Simply that a committee, on which you have got a majority, shall examine the bill—a committee, too, a majority of whom do not want to examine it. I do not for one, but I think it due and right to advocate this course as I did on the silver bill. What do we ask? We ask you simply to let us examine this great measure covering millions. Let us have it examined by a committee, let us have it debated a reasonable time in the House, every objection being brought against it that can be, and then pass it.

I want but one thing more. I want this bill when so perfected to be a finality when it is done. I want to get a bill that will be final against the railroad, and which you will make final against yourselves. Stop the lobby—

Mr. BRIDGES. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. BRIDGES. The gentleman has asserted this bill has not been considered in the Committee on the Judiciary. Is that the fact?

Mr. BUTLER. It is. It never has been read in the committee. It never has been in the committee. Not a copy of it to-day is to be found in the committee-room or in the drawer of any member of the Judiciary Committee in this House.

Mr. ITTNER. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. BUTLER. I will for a moment. I believe I have five minutes more.

Mr. ITTNER. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if the only reason he has for asking this bill to go to the Committee on the Judiciary is to perfect it and if he is in favor of the main principles of the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. I have already said I am in favor of the main principles of the bill; and I was saying when I was interrupted, before my friend asked the question, that whenever you pass these main features of the bill to indemnify everybody rightly and get it so it cannot be interfered with by the courts and then say this shall be final on this subject I will vote for it; but I will not vote for any man's property to be confiscated either by a republican Congress or by a democratic Congress whenever a lobby thinks it can make money by so doing or some dishonest servant of the company chooses to make charges against it, because no property is safe against such attacks as those.

I do not believe in the "wild justice" of the people. I do not believe that Congress is any better than the rest of the people; and I do not believe that Congress has a right to reserve the power of confiscation under the phrase "to alter, and amend, or repeal" the charter or to give the right of confiscation under our form of government. I will vote for a bill to put aside a proper amount to secure the mortgagees. I do not say this is not a proper and fair amount, carefully guarding other things; and let this thing be settled forever and I will give the best talent I have as a lawyer in perfecting such bill so that no court can find fault with its provisions.

One thing further. Do gentlemen remember—

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed ten minutes more.

Mr. FINLEY. I object.

Mr. WRIGHT. The objection comes too late.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It was heard by the Chair in time.

Mr. BEEBE. I do not mean any discourtesy to the gentleman from Massachusetts, but when the original extension of ten minutes was made I gave notice that I would object to a further extension of time, but I think I can stand ten minutes more if that will be satisfactory to the gentleman.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not want to wear on the constitution of the gentleman from New York any more, but I warn him that he has a great deal to stand in the heat of the weather before we get through.

Mr. BEEBE. The gentleman refers to my constitution, and I insist upon my rights and object to a further extension of time.

Mr. STEELE. I also object and shall insist upon the objection.

Mr. COX, of New York. The gentlemen on the other side of this question have already occupied half of the time. The gentleman from Massachusetts complains that these things were done in war times. The act of 1864 giving priority to the twenty-seven-million mortgage bonds was passed during our troubles in the civil war. This bill has been pending for years. It has been upon the Speaker's table for over two weeks, and we all understand it; it is not a snap judgment on the House. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. CHALMERS.]

Mr. CHALMERS. I cannot undertake to discuss this question in five minutes. I thank the gentleman from New York for his courtesy, but will not avail myself of it for the purpose of discussing the bill. I could not undertake to discuss this question in five minutes and therefore I do not desire to enter upon any constitutional argument, but at the request of a colleague upon the Committee on the Pacific Railroad I desire to make this statement. A bill almost word for word as this which now comes to us from the Senate was examined and considered in the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, a committee which has upon it I believe lawyers of long standing, perhaps of as much standing as those who have the honor to be upon the Judiciary Committee, and I say that if this bill is committed or referred to any committee it should go to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and not to the Committee on the Judiciary. Sir, by the rules of the House the Committee on the Judiciary is only authorized to consider matters touching judicial jurisdiction and decisions. This question was sent to the Committee on the Judiciary in the Senate by a resolution. It went to the Committee on the Judiciary of this House in the Forty-fourth Congress by a resolution directing them to inquire into legal questions involved in the resolutions. From that grew up the bill. But the bill itself is a bill in regard to Pacific Railroads, and it should be properly referred, if at all, to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad. A similar bill has been referred to that committee and thoroughly considered by men who have some standing as lawyers at home, if not in this House. They have reported it almost unanimously, and therefore I think that it is almost treating that committee with contempt for a gentleman to rise and say that the House has not considered the question at all. The gentleman from Massachusetts might well say that he had not considered the subject, for he showed it by the first argument he made, that it proposed to take money from the Government, and a member of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad [Mr. MORRISON] showed that he did not understand the bill. He had no idea what was in it so far as he was concerned, and he has rightly said that he as one member of the House did not understand it.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a simple question?

Mr. CHALMERS. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. Did you read this bill in print or in manuscript?

Mr. CHALMERS. We read it in print?

Mr. BUTLER. It has never yet been printed, as it now lies on the Speaker's table; never.

Mr. CHALMERS. I say to the gentleman that, with the exception of some few verbal changes, this is the very bill introduced by myself, considered by our committee, and reported to this House. When the gentleman talks about this bill undertaking to dictate to the Supreme Court what they shall decide, it simply indicates that gentlemen like himself shall not be employed by these railroad companies to take advantage of legal technicalities. The bill says it shall be decided in the courts upon the very right of the case. When was it ever known that a law of that kind was either unconstitutional or ill-advised or was attempting to dictate to the courts? It is but a matter of pleading and practice, a practice adopted in many of the States. When important questions are to be decided, in the decision of which a large number of interests are involved, just such language is used; that no technical exceptions shall be taken on account of multifariousness, on account of parties, or anything of the kind, but the courts shall go to the very right and justice of the matter. That is all there is in it to which the gentleman now excepts.

I say to the gentleman that the whole spirit of this legislation is in the line of that which is sought when we have not a remedy for the evils of to-day, and Congress or the Legislature is called upon to provide a remedy. Here is a corporation growing in debt which at maturity will amount to $177,000,000. The country has as security for that debt a second mortgage on about two thousand miles of road, or $88,500 per mile.

No gentleman will pretend that this is security for the debt. Railroad men contend that a better new road could now be built for half this price. The stockholders are growing rich on the dividends they make annually to themselves. The Government and the people without some such legislation as this at the end of twenty years will be left without remedy for their money.

Mr. COX, of New York. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I shall give this bill my cordial support. It is important that it should at once be put on its passage without reference to a committee. It has received a most careful consideration in the Senate, and after one of the most learned and exhaustive debates on record has passed that body by a most decided majority. Perhaps there is no measure that will be considered this Congress which is of more consequence to the people than this bill. Its passage is a striking evidence of the fact that the power of the people is at last greater than that of the corporations. Having passed the Senate by a large majority, I hope this House will show that it is equally in earnest on this subject, and that the bill will pass here by such a majority as will make a veto unavailing. I believe it will pass. Its provisions are just to the railroads and at the same time fully secure the rights and protect the interests of the people.

For many years the people have looked in vain for some legislation in their interest. It is to be regretted that for fifteen years past the majority of the legislation of Congress has been in the interest of the protected and favored few at the expense of the great mass of the people. But now there is a change, and that, too, for the better. The people can now have their fair share of the benefits of wise legislation, and therefore I hail the passage of this bill as the dawn of a political millennium.

One word in reference to the fifth section of the bill and I will yield the balance of my time to my colleague [Mr. MORRISON] who is a member of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad and has much more carefully considered the subject than I have. The fifth section is apparently in conflict with the first section of the bill, in this: that upon a casual consideration there may be other liens recognized as prior to that of the United States than the first-mortgage bonds of the roads. A careful examination of all the provisions of the bill will show that this is not the case. The first section of the bill clearly indicates what lien shall be regarded as prior to that of the United States, in defining what shall be regarded as the net earnings of the road. I refer to the following provision in section 1:

That the net earnings mentioned in said act of 1862 of said railroad companies respectively shall be ascertained by deducting from the gross amount of their earnings respectively the necessary expenses actually paid within the year in operating the same and keeping the same in a state of repair, and also the sum paid by them respectively within the year in discharge of interest on their first-mortgage bonds, whose lien has priority over the lien of the United States, and excluding from consideration all sums owing or paid by said companies respectively for interest upon any other portion of their indebtedness.

If this section be compared with section 5, the apparent inconsistency will be seen. Section 5 is as follows:

Sec. 5. That whenever it shall be made satisfactorily to appear to the Secretary of the Treasury by either of said companies that 75 per cent. of its net earnings, as heretofore defined, for any current year are or were insufficient to pay the interest for such year upon the obligations of such company, in respect of which obligations there may exist a lien paramount to that of the United States, and that such interest has been paid out of such net earnings, said Secretary is hereby authorized, and it is made his duty, to remit for such current year so much of the 25 per cent. of net earnings required to be paid into the sinking fund, as aforesaid, as may have been thus applied and used in the payment of interest as aforesaid.

There can be no obligations paramount to that of the United States, according to section 1 of the bill, except the amount necessary to keep the road in repair, to pay running expenses, and the interest on the first-mortgage bonds. I called on the author of this bill to-day, and asked an explanation of this apparent inconsistency. He informed me that section 5 was in the original bill as referred to the Committee on the Judiciary in the Senate; that section 1 as it passed was an amendment to the original section as referred; and that in the first section of the original bill the words "and also the sum paid by them respectively within the year in discharge of interest on their first-mortgage bonds, whose lien has priority over that of the United States" did not appear. After these words were inserted in the first section, then there was no longer any use for the fifth section. Hence the latter section may be considered as out of the bill. It forms no part of it as it now stands, and is mere surplusage. This explanation leaves the bill free from all ambiguity or possibility of misconstruction hereafter. I yield the remainder of my time to my colleague, [Mr. MORRISON.]

Mr. MORRISON. The purpose of the bill under consideration is to secure repayment of the money paid and to be paid by the Government on its bonds issued to aid the construction of the Pacific Railroad. Besides the grant of corporate powers, valuable franchises, and lands equal in acres to the seven smaller States of the Union, made by the acts of Congress of July 1, 1862, and July 2, 1864, the Government issued and delivered to the Pacific Railroad Companies bonds amounting to $64,623,612 upon which we pay, and must continue to pay for thirty years from their date, interest exceeding $3,000,000 per annum after deducting what the Government now receives from the railroad companies. We pay this excess of $3,000,000 interest semi-annually, but it is to be repaid to us only at the maturity of the thirty-year bonds at which time principal and unpaid interest will far exceed the value of the railroad and property on which the Government has only a second lien, the railroad companies having issued, and secured by a first lien or mortgage, their bonds equal in amount to the bonds so issued to them by the Government. In short, without some amendment to said acts of Congress so controlling a portion of the earnings of the roads as to make such portion of their earnings applicable to the payment of the bonds issued in aid of the roads' construction, the money so paid and to be paid by the Government, amounting to many millions, will be lost.

What was the nature and purpose of this transaction and what are the relative rights of the Government and railroad companies under it? Certainly the Government did not issue and deliver its bonds to the railroad companies as an investment, for the Government was then a borrower, and the money paid for the railroads applied to its own obligations would have saved a hundred and fifty millions of dollars, even if the money and interest paid shall be refunded when the bonds are payable. Neither were these bonds issued as a donation, else it would not have been enacted in section 6 of said act of 1862 and section 5 of said act of 1864 that said companies might pay "in the same or other bonds, Treasury notes, or other evidences of debt of the United States, to be allowed at par;" that after said road should be completed "at least 5 per cent. of the net earnings" annually and half the compensation for services rendered the Government should be applied in payment until the whole amount of said bonds and interest is fully paid.

The national and public purpose of Congress in affording aid in building their roads by issuing bonds to said companies, as expressed in said acts, was "to secure to the Government at all times, (but particularly in time of war,) the use and benefit of the same for postal, military, and other purposes."

By the provisions of said acts, as well as from the reason of the thing, the Government had a right to have the roads kept in repair and use and to have preference in their use for the transportation of its mails, troops, and munitions of war for reasonable rates of compensation. For these purposes the railroad companies were the agents of the Government which gave them corporate existence, life, and sustenance. For these purposes they were instrumentalities which by the law of their creation the Government had a right to use. The power to enforce such a right would seem necessarily to go along with the right itself, but that there might be no misunderstanding about it Congress reserved to itself the right to "at any time alter, amend, or repeal" said acts.

That this expressly reserved power to amend, alter, and repeal may be exercised at any time to secure to the Government at all times the transportation of mails, troops, and public stores, does not appear to be seriously questioned. Whatever opinions may have been obtained in the past, now it is conceded apparently by the most strenuous advocate for the sacredness of vested rights that State Legislatures, as to corporations chartered by them, have, and that Congress, as to corporations chartered by it, has, power to compel corporations to do that for which they were created and for which they have been invested with a portion of the sovereign power; but it is insisted by the opponents of this bill that neither payment of debts nor keeping obligations to refund what has been advanced in the construction of their roads is among the duties which such corporations may be so compelled to perform.

When we would so amend said acts as to enforce the duty to carry the mails, troops, and stores of the Government we are admitted to be in the just and proper exercise of the reserved power of amendment. When we would so amend as to compel the application of a part of the road's earnings to the repayment of money which went into its construction, without which there could be no earnings, then it is insisted by the opponents of this measure of justice and fair-dealing that we are breaking faith, impairing the obligation of contracts, and violating the Constitution.

The companies have a property in the franchise and road with which they earn money no less inviolable than in the money earned, and it is difficult to conceive a legal distinction in the exercise of the reserved right of amendment applicable to one and not to the other. The law itself makes no such distinction. Yet upon such distinction is based the argument advanced here and elsewhere that Congress, seeing the affairs of the road so administered as to endanger the right of the Government at all times, and especially in time of war, to have its troops and stores carried, may rightfully exercise its reserved power to amend or repeal the franchise, and may put the roads out of which come all the earnings into other hands; but that, seeing the earnings so misappropriated as to necessarily result in a loss of the Government advancements, Congress cannot so exercise its reserved power of amendment as to compel such just administration of the corporate rights conferred as will prevent such loss.

It is further said that this advancement of bonds was a mere contract of loan between the Government and railroad companies with the terms of payment unalterably fixed in the law itself, which exempt it from the power of alteration and amendment reserved in the same law; that while Congress has power to "borrow money on the credit of the United States," no power has been conferred to lend money. That it may and does borrow, therefore, as a sovereign, but can, like a bank or insurance company, only lend as a civil corporation.

Now, sir, I will not waste words to show that if power has not been conferred on Congress to lend money, then it cannot lend either as a civil corporation or a sovereign. I have already said that the Government did not issue and deliver its bonds to the railroad companies by way of investing the many millions of dollars it thereby obligated itself to pay for them while it was itself a borrower. Nor, sir, was it done as a loan. The Government exercises the power to build military and post roads through the instrumentalities of private corporations or otherwise, to provide for the common defense and promote the general welfare—if rightfully at all—as a sovereign. As a sovereign and to attain the purposes enumerated in said acts of Congress it created one corporation, recognized others, and issued and delivered the bonds as a means and incident to the end for which the sovereign power was exercised. This is true, or the whole transaction was without warrant in the Constitution. And so, Mr. Speaker, the effort to so divide the contract between the Government and its agencies as to limit its power of amendment, unlimited in the terms of the law, to the control of the franchise and the road, and forbid it as to the road's earnings, must fail, it seems to me, for want of law as well as lack of justice to support it. The reserved power to alter, amend, and repeal may be invoked to secure such a just and equitable administration of the affairs of the companies and such disposition of the earnings as will protect and enforce all the rights of the Government and the people. And I so understand the law to be interpreted by the courts as declared in Tomlinson vs. Jessup, 15 Wallace, 458:

The object of the reservation, and of similar reservations in other charters, is to prevent a grant of corporate rights and privileges in a form which will preclude legislative interference with their exercise, if the public interest should at any time require such interference. It is a provision intended to preserve to the State control over its contract with the corporations, which without that provision would be irrevocable, and protected from any measures affecting its obligation.

And in Miller vs. The States, 15 Wallace, 498:

Power to legislate, founded upon such a reservation in a charter to a private corporation, is certainly not without limit, and it may well be admitted that it cannot be exercised to take away or destroy rights acquired by virtue of such charter, and which by a legitimate use of the powers granted have become vested in the corporation, but it may be safely affirmed that the reserved power may be exercised, and to almost any extent, to carry into effect the original purposes of the grant or to secure the due administration of its affairs so as to protect the rights of its stockholders and of creditors, and for the proper disposition of the assets.

And by the whole current of authority as shown by numerous cases cited in its support at both ends of the Capitol pending the consideration of this question. And so, too, it would seem the railroad companies understood the law. It was shown by a report of a committee of this House in the Forty-third Congress (the Credit Mobilier investigation committee of which Hon. Jeremiah Wilson was chairman) that the Union Pacific Railroad and the Credit Mobilier were "identical in interest;" that Credit Mobilier stock paid dividends of 300 or 400 per cent.; and that the agent and representative of the railroad went about the Senate and House of Representatives distributing this stock among Members and Senators. Railroad companies are usually so managed as to get money for those who manage them, and yet it did appear that in this case they believed they put this valuable stock "where it would do most good" when so distributed. The railroad acts had been passed; the grants had been made; the bonds had been issued; what other "good" was to be obtained by so distributing Credit Mobilier shares but congressional forbearance in the exercise of the right to so alter and amend said acts as to compel the companies to surrender a part of their earnings in repayment of what the Government has advanced for them?

This reserved power to alter and amend has been exercised in relation to the national banks when some of them have been compelled to surrender part of their circulation, to which they had a right under their charters. It is by the exercise of this power alone that they can be compelled to surrender their circulating notes before the expiration of their charters.

Good faith, it is said, requires that we should forbear the exercise of the power of amendment until the railroad companies are in default, and that they are not and will not be in default as to repayment of the money paid on the bonds issued to them until their maturity. The ability of the roads to pay is not and cannot be disputed. Yet Mr. Dillen, representing the Union Pacific, more than three years ago advised us of his purpose to pay in his own good time and upon his own condition when in a communication to the Secretary of the Treasury making an offer of adjustment wholly inadequate he said:

The bonds are accumulating an interest account, also uncollectible until the principal is due. Principal and interest, when due, will amount to the very large aggregate of over $77,000,000.

For this very large amount the Government has only a second mortgage, and if it be allowed to accumulate without any provision being made to meet it, the company will probably be utterly unable to pay it.

At the same time it is equally manifest that the Government will be unable to collect it, except upon the assumption that it will advance the money to discharge prior mortgages and run the road on Government account—a policy which wise statesmanship could not advise.

Mr. Huntington, on the part of the other road embraced in the funding bill, the Central Pacific, advised us of a similar purpose on the part of his company when referring to principal and interest of the bonds. He said to the Senate Judiciary Committee:

By the time both mature and become payable it is not at all likely the property will be worth their aggregate sum, and if the shrinking and settling of prices should continue further it may happen that it will not suffice to pay more than the first mortgages.

With the ability to meet their engagements and notoriously making large dividends among stockholders, we have notice of their purpose to be in default, which is at once a default and a fraud. It is not on the part of either company a "due administration of its affairs."

What faith these companies have kept with the Government and the people will appear in the report of the Wilson Credit Mobilier committee, before referred to, wherein it is shown—

That the moneys borrowed by the corporation, under a power given them, only to meet the necessities of the construction and endowment of the road, have been distributed in dividends among the corporators; that the stock was issued, not to men who paid for it at par in money, but who paid for it at not more than thirty cents on the dollar in road-making; that of the Government directors some of them have neglected their duties and others have been interested in the transactions by which the provisions of the organic law have been evaded; that at least one of the commissioners appointed by the President has been directly bribed to betray his trust by the gift of $25,000; that the chief engineer of the road was largely interested in the contracts for its construction; and that there has been an attempt to prevent the exercise of the reserved power in Congress by inducing influential members of Congress to become interested in the profits of the transaction.

The railroad companies which this bill is to affect received about $11,000,000 annually of net earnings, after deducting all the costs of operating and management of their roads and the interest on their first-mortgage bonds. The reasonable and just provisions of this bill require them to apply or place a part not exceeding one-fourth of such net earnings where it may, with all its constantly accruing and compounding interest, be applied to the like just and reasonable demands of the Government that its money which built the roads shall be refunded.

More than this bill requires might in justice be demanded. And the fifth section ought not, in my judgment, to have been made a part of it; but we have still the power to alter, amend, and repeal, if the bill does not afford all the relief which justice demands.

Mr. Speaker, something has been said, and much more might be said, of the danger to be apprehended from the exercise by the National Government of ungranted power. I am not unmindful of that danger. I have witnessed its approach year by year and day by day with apprehension, quickened, I trust, with something of attachment for the good Government it may convert if not overthrow. But, sir, may I suggest that I have yet to see the first advance of this dangerous power in the direction of any undue restraint of overgrown grasping corporations and monopolies. It is said that no danger is to be apprehended from these, because there are agencies, Congress among them, by which they may be controlled. Let us then see to it that they do not control the agencies.

Mr. COX, of New York. I ask consent that members desiring to do so be allowed to print in the RECORD remarks on this funding bill.

There was no objection, and leave was granted accordingly. [See Appendix.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. McMAHON.]

Mr. McMAHON. In the five minutes' time allowed me in the close of this debate it is impossible, of course, to make an argument upon a legal proposition. But where there are so many lawyers as there are in this House a short statement of one's views is sufficient to enable them to form their judgment on such a question.

The main objection to this bill, coming from the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] and implied in the question of my distinguished colleague from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] is that it violates a contract. They rely of course upon the law as laid down in the famous Dartmouth College case and in the line of decisions following it. Now let me put an analogous case. Take the settled law of the United States to-day, in the matter of bankruptcy, upon the power of a State to pass a bankrupt law in the absence of a general national bankrupt law. A State may pass a bankrupt law which will operate upon all contracts entered into after its passage between citizens of the same State. But it cannot pass a bankrupt law which will operate upon any contract made prior to its passage. This is settled law to-day, as the gentleman from Massachusetts well knows, because when there is no bankrupt law of the United States in force, there is a State bankrupt law in his own State.

Now, why is a State bankrupt law which acts upon contracts entered into prior to its passage unconstitutional? Because it violates that provision of the Constitution of the United States which says that no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of a contract. Therefore a bankrupt law affecting contracts entered into before its passage impairs the obligation of contracts. But a State can pass a bankrupt law, and it will operate upon contracts made between citizens of the same State after its passage, because the bankrupt law, in contemplation of law, enters into all contracts between the parties. And this is the law, although the parties contracting may be in fact ignorant of the existence of the law. The right to be discharged from the contract upon compliance with the bankrupt law is regarded as a part of its obligation. Hence such discharge does not violate its obligation.

The Pacific Railroad Companies stand precisely in this position under the laws organizing them. We passed certain laws which, under the unfortunate decision of the Supreme Court of the United States to which I have already alluded, were not only charters to the company but were as well contracts. But I would say to my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] that in the very so-called contract we reserved the right to alter, amend, or repeal the charter and the contract; and, having this absolute right, the exercise of it is a part of the contract and does not violate its obligation. But this is not simply a contract between individuals, but a charter, or, if you please, a contract entered into by the Government in its sovereign capacity, acting as a sovereign and using sovereign powers, in building under private instrumentalities great national highways to the Pacific coast. It did not intend to create a great monopoly beyond its control. It did not intend to donate the many millions of dollars it advanced. But it reserved the right to alter, amend, or repeal, not the franchise merely, but the whole law; not any particular section, but every section. Those who organized the companies under these laws took all the risks of amendment, alteration, or repeal. It was a part of their contract, compensated by its other liberal terms.

My friend says that "this bill will not hold water when it comes before the Supreme Court of the United States." I do not believe that he really expressed his opinion as a lawyer when he said so, because it was not five minutes afterward that he said, in answer to a question, that he was in favor of the main features of this bill.

I never took him to be a man who was in favor of anything that would not "hold water." But if he favors the main features of this bill he must favor the very parts of it which he pretends to say will not "hold water;" for they are not only the main features, but they are the only ones. All there is in this bill is contained in the very sections which he says will not hold water.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we do not want this bill to go to the Committee on the Judiciary. It would be safe there, but it is safer here. This democratic House is not following the bidding of the Senate of the United States, as the gentleman from Massachusetts says. We do not follow the bidding of any person. But there is one thing that a democratic House never yet did within my recollection. It never bowed down before the railroad corporations of this country. If the gentleman can say as much for the political party with which he now finds himself associated he will have to violate the truth of history. All the tremendous power of these great corporations was the voluntary gift of the republican party. History, as written by republican statesmen, says that every step taken by republican Congresses in their favor was marked by fraud and corruption. I welcome the day when some justice is to be done for the Government and the people.

It is true that we passed the silver bill as it came from the Senate. Why? Because we felt that the Senate was hostile to the general scope of the bill as passed by the House; that amendment would be absolute defeat of everything, and we took what we could get. This was sound policy. We do not propose to pass this bill at the dictation of the Senate. It meets our views exactly. The record of the House is far in advance of that of the Senate upon this question. As the Senate becomes more democratic it begins to do more justice to the people and leans less to corporations; and we welcome the passage of this bill by it as a good omen for the future. We take great pleasure under the circumstances in disregarding the warning of our friend from Massachusetts as to the fate of this bill in the courts. We prefer to take the judgment of the many able men who have given their opinion upon it at the other end of the Capitol; and the country, having almost implicit confidence in the ability, statesmanship, and integrity of the distinguished Senator from Ohio who led the fight in that body, will thank him and the democratic party for the sentiment which has finally compelled these enormous corporations to deal justly with their creditors, the people of the United States. There are millions in this bill, but for the first time it is millions for the people.

Mr. COX, of New York. I demand the previous question.

Mr. PRICE. I want to ask a question in reference to the condition of the bill before the House. Has it been read a second time?

The SPEAKER. It has not been; but it will be now read a second time.

Mr. PRICE. I only wanted to know whether the bill had been read the second time and now comes up on its third reading.

The SPEAKER. It has not yet been read a second time. The Clerk read the bill a second time by its title.

Mr. FRYE. The bill having now been read a second time, I move that it be referred to the Judiciary Committee and "put under way."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not on the floor for that purpose, the gentleman from New York having demanded the previous question.

Mr. COX, of New York. I do not yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FRYE. I make the point of order that under the rules the previous question cannot be demanded to preclude a motion of this kind. The rule declares distinctly and positively that this motion shall be first in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that this bill, like every other, is under the control of the majority of the House. The bill has now been read a second time by its title, and the Chair thinks that it is in order under Rule 42 to demand the previous question on the engrossment.

Mr. COX, of New York. I insist on the demand.

Mr. SAMPSON. I wish to inquire what is the main question. Is it not on the third reading of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The bill is now on its third reading.

Mr. SAMPSON. Then that is the main question; and on that the gentleman demands the previous question. Now does not the motion to commit come in and take precedence of the previous question? Do not the rules of the House expressly so provide?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. On the contrary, Rule 42, providing the order in which motions shall be submitted, recognizes distinctly the priority of the demand for the previous question. That is the rule which has uniformly governed, in the experience of the Chair.

Mr. SAMPSON. It has been constantly held in this House, it seems to me, that the motion to commit takes precedence of a motion to postpone or a motion for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Rule 42 states differently. The majority of the House, if they desire to commit the bill, have only to vote down the previous question.

Mr. SAMPSON. If the Chair will wait a moment, I am certain I can find the rule to which I refer.

The SPEAKER. Rule 42 is the rule that controls this question. The rule to which the gentleman refers may be Rule 132.

Mr. CALKINS. I am not in favor of a motion to commit; but it occurs to me that Rule 42 is a general rule—

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. CALKINS. And that this other rule is a special rule operating in a case of this kind and taking it out of the operation of Rule 42.

The SPEAKER. This bill is before the House, and is to be governed by the rules of the House. Rule 42 is as explicit as language can make it.

Mr. FRYE. I ask the Chair very respectfully—

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that.

Mr. FRYE. I ask the Speaker, very respectfully, to state what Rule 54 means:

After one hour shall have been devoted to reports from committees and resolutions, it shall be in order, pending the consideration or discussion thereof, to entertain a motion that the House do now proceed to dispose of the business on the Speaker's table, and to the orders of the day—January 5, 1872; which being decided in the affirmative, the Speaker shall dispose of the business on his table in the following order, namely:

First. Messages and other executive communications.

Second. Messages from the Senate and amendments proposed by the Senate to bills of the House.

Third. Bills and resolutions from the Senate on their first and second reading, that they be referred to committees and put under way; but if, on being read a second time, no motion being made to commit, they are to be ordered to their third reading, unless objection be made.

Now, under the ruling of the Speaker, to which I respectfully submit, (for I simply ask this question for information,) what does this rule amount to?

The SPEAKER. It does not amount to what the gentleman supposes, in the face of a rule specifically stating that the previous question shall have priority of a motion to commit, and if sustained cuts off that motion.

Mr. SAMPSON. I call the attention of the Speaker to page 272 of the Manual, where he will find the positive language of the rule. As I understand, this bill after it had been read a second time was open to debate. That being the case, this rule steps in and provides—

When a question is under debate, no motion shall be received, but to adjourn, to lie on the table, for the previous question, to postpone to a day certain, to commit or amend.

It does seem to me that this is the positive language of the rule, which ought not to be violated. The gentleman from New York was recognized to make the motion for the previous question. Then any other gentleman had the right to rise and move to lay on the table or commit, and they must take precedence.

The SPEAKER. Rule 42 recognizes the right to lie upon the table but makes the motion to commit a subsequent motion to the demand for the previous question.

Mr. COX, of New York. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. COX, of New York, demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. BELL demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 243, nays 2, not voting 46; as follows:

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. I am paired with Mr. BANKS.

Mr. FORNEY. I wish to announce that Mr. WAIT is paired with Mr. PHELPS, and that Mr. SHELLEY is paired with Mr. EVANS, of Indiana.

Mr. BLISS. I desire to announce that my colleague, Mr. VEEDER, is detained from the House by severe illness.

Mr. O'NEILL. My colleague, Mr. SMITH, is absent by leave of the House, and if present, would vote in the affirmative. Judge KELLEY, who is temporarily absent, would also, if present, vote in the affirmative.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. My colleague, Mr. VAN VORHES, is absent by leave of the House. If present, he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. CALKINS. I am paired with Mr. CLARK, of New Jersey, on all political questions.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. TIPTON is paired with Mr. TOWNSEND, of Illinois, and Mr. BRENTANO with Mr. HARRISON. I believe they would all vote in the affirmative, if present.

Mr. HUNGERFORD. Mr. DWIGHT, of New York, is paired with his colleague, Mr. ECKHOFF.

Mr. LANDERS. My colleagues, Mr. WAIT and Mr. PHELPS, who are paired on all political questions, if present would both vote in the affirmative.

Mr. KEIGHTLEY. My colleagues, Mr. MCGOWAN and Mr. ELLSWORTH, who are absent, would, if present, vote in the affirmative.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. COX, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPEAL OF BANKRUPT LAW.

The SPEAKER. The next business on the Speaker's table is a bill (S. No. 35) to repeal the bankrupt law, and the bill will be read.

Mr. MCMAHON. I desire to make a statement in regard to that bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill will first be read.

Mr. MILLS. I move the House do now adjourn. We can consider that to-morrow morning.

Mr. MCMAHON. It was to anticipate that I desired to make a statement. It is exceedingly important to the country that some action should be taken. Men are being driven into bankruptcy by the expected action of the House, which I think may be different from what the public generally expect, but we cannot tell. It is a bill which should be acted on right away.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Pennsylvania both move the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MCMAHON. Then I hope it will be voted down.

EVENING SESSION FOR DEBATE.

Mr. DURHAM. There are several gentlemen who desire to make speeches on various subjects and they ask the House to sit to-night for debate only, no business whatever to be transacted.

Mr. MILLS, and Mr. WHITE of Pennsylvania, withdrew the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to a session this evening for debate only, no business whatever to be transacted?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I give notice that immediately after the morning hour to-morrow I shall move to take up this Senate bill repealing the bankrupt law.

The SPEAKER. It will come up as unfinished business.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. VAN VORHES, for ten days, on account of important business; and

To Mr. DICKEY, for ten days, on account of important business.

APPOINTMENT ON COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. GIBSON as a member of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, to fill a vacancy.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I move that the House now take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

Mr. MCMAHON. Before the question is taken on that motion, I wish to ask the Chair whether the bill repealing the bankrupt law will come up as unfinished business to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it will.

Mr. WOOD. I hope the Chair will investigate that and let us know positively. I doubt it.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I withdraw the motion for a recess to allow the consideration of the bill to repeal the bankrupt law.

Mr. MCMAHON. I ask that the bill be read.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

Mr. KNOTT. I move that the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock this evening.

Mr. MCMAHON. I hope that will be voted down.

Mr. BURCHARD. Is not the bill on the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. It is not. It is before the House.

The question being taken on Mr. KNOTT's motion, there were—ayes 93, noes 89.

Several members called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. MCMAHON and Mr. KNOTT were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 103, noes not counted.

So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina, will occupy the chair at the evening session as Speaker pro tempore.

The result of the vote was then announced; and accordingly (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until seven o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at seven o'clock and thirty minutes p. m., Mr. VANCE in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The session of the House this evening is for debate only, no business to be transacted. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] is entitled to the floor.

TARIFF REFORM.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, in their efforts to reform our revenue laws the Committee of Ways and Means have felt the force and proved the truth of the remark made by Burke to Adam Smith that "he might send forth his theories about the freedom of commerce as if he were lecturing upon pure mathematics, but legislators must proceed by slow degrees, impeded as they are by the friction of interest and the friction of prejudice." A hundred years have down since then, but the truth remains the same. The path of legislation is obstructed to-day by the same friction of interest and prejudice, and we are compelled to advance toward the emancipation of our people by gradual and tardy steps. Those who are interested in the spoil gathered by an onerous tariff have hung around the committee-room and interposed every impediment they could to its progress. Public demonstrations have been gotten up by the deluded victims of prejudice to manufacture public opinion, that most potent of all influences in a republican government.

The vast masses of the people whose prosperity and happiness are so inseparably connected with and dependent upon success in thorough reform have been so stunned and stupefied by their distress that they have remained silent and despondent spectators in the presence of the struggle. The committee have found themselves compelled to inquire what measure can we pass instead of what measure should we pass. The bill they have reported is a step and only a step in the line of march. It scatches but does not kill the snake. Perhaps it is all we could expect at the present time and under the pressure of the present circumstances. Before we can expect complete deliverance from our fetters the people must be aroused and public opinion must form and make its power felt for the vindication of their rights. When that is done and with such force and determination as to command obedience they will be freed from the slavery of the present revenue system. It is and has been our boast that we are a free people and enjoy the blessings of a free government. This is indeed a bright picture, and one upon which we love to look. But every time we fix our eyes upon it we see a black spot that mars its beauty. Our commerce is in fetters and our people are enslaved by cunningly devised revenue laws to merciless and grinding monopolies. Their revenue laws are not made in the interest of the people, but in the interest of a few thousand persons, and require annually of the millions a sacrifice of the products of their labor in value sufficient to pay three-fourths of the national debt.

Can such things be,
And overcome us like a summer's cloud.

How is this vast sum taken from the pockets of the laboring masses and deposited in the pockets of Government favorites? By the instrumentality of customs laws in whose arithmetic, as Adam Smith well says, "two and two instead of making four only make one." Protection, falsely so called, has run down our revenues, annihilated our commerce, filled the land with smugglers, swept our ships from the ocean, and overwhelmed the land with suffering and distress. It compels our people to purchase over four billions in value of the products of American manufactures at prices on an average of 33½ per cent. higher than they could purchase them in other markets to which they are forbidden to go. It exempts the wealthy from taxation for the support of the Government and lays all the crushing burden upon the shoulders of the poor. It robs the laboring people of more than five hundred millions annually to bestow as a bounty upon a few rich favorites, and to effect its object destroys for them over five hundred millions more. It influenced Congress to lay a tax of sixty millions on twenty millions' worth of whisky consumed by the people and that costs them in consumption not a farthing less than $200,000,000. It caused Congress to lay a tax of forty millions on thirty millions' worth of tobacco consumed by them at a cost of not less than a hundred and fifty millions of dollars. The consumption of whisky, tobacco, and the products of manufactories protected against competition are made to cost the people of the United States at least sixteen hundred millions more than they otherwise would but for the infamous revenue laws that curse this land. This enormous spoliation is more than one-fourth of the annual products of all the labor of the country.

Our present revenue laws not only enhance the prices of all the articles we purchase but lower the price of all the articles we sell, and thus it marches upon us with both hands extended, binds the strong man, and spoils his goods. We cannot sell without we buy, and we cannot export (except to pay debt) without we import; and the foreigner cannot take our cotton, wheat, corn, and beef unless we take in exchange his iron, or cotton goods, or woolen goods, or whatever else he may have and we may want, and we must confine ourselves to an oversupplied home market and the limited few in foreign markets who may be able to buy with money or exchange with articles whose prices are increased from fifty to a hundred per cent. above the price in the foreign market. The same protection that shuts out imports shuts in exports, and there being no sufficient demand for them they sink in value and the producer must take whatever he can get. If the people of England, France, and Germany could send us their woolens, cottons, silks, and hardware without Government hinderance they would gladly exchange them for our raw cotton, wheat, corn, beef, and bacon.

That would increase the demand, and the increased demand would increase the prices, and increased prices would encourage our labor, increase our productions, increase our wealth, and bring again contentment and happiness to the bosoms of our people. If protection, so called, did not prohibit us from building or buying ships, the ocean would be covered with our sails, a vast number of our people would find profitable employment, and the profits of the carrying trade would bring to the pockets of our people a hundred millions annually that are now taken from us. If it did not forbid the free movement of commerce our railroads would find employment at profitable rates for the largely increased transportation for all commodities going and coming whithersoever want invited them and paid for them the highest prices. Seventy thousand miles of railroads would rise out of bankruptcy and give employment to hundreds of thousands of persons now idle and miserable. If it did not forbid prosperity to the millions of consumers the American manufacturer would find markets all over the world for his wares at remunerative prices and make larger profits, do a more secure business, and give employment to many thousands of starving people. If the law would cease protecting forty millions of people out of fifteen or sixteen hundred millions of their earnings annually they would increase in wealth that much faster, and be able to buy and pay for the products of our manufactories and mines.

But until the present system of embargo on our commerce is abolished and all classes of labor emancipated we shall have prostration and distress throughout all our hive. Just in proportion as we lower our duties will we increase our imports and exports. The highest commerce would be reached by the repeal of all tariffs, but, as we must depend on taxing commerce to obtain a part of our revenue, some duties must be imposed, and to whatever extent they are they give an advantage to the American manufacturer. England obtains one-fourth of her revenue by customs, and that laid upon non-competing articles. France raises one-tenth, Belgium one-sixteenth, Austria one-eighteenth, Italy one-fifteenth, Russia one-tenth, Netherlands one-eighteenth, Turkey one-twelfth, and the United States largely over half, and until within the last two years over two-thirds. The committee, in revising the tariff, should have directed their attention to two objects: first, to relieve the people, and second, to replenish the Treasury. In solving the question of revenue they ought to have made the six propositions of Mr. Robert J. Walker the platform upon which they stood, and every step taken should have been in strict conformity to it. In his report as Secretary of the Treasury, dated December 3, 1845, he lays down the following general principles to be observed in imposing duties:

1. That no more money should be collected than is necessary for the wants of the Government economically administered.
2. That no duty be imposed on any article above the lowest rate that will yield the largest amount of revenue.
3. That below such rate discrimination may be made descending in the scale of duties, or for imperative reasons the article may be placed in the list of those free from all duty.
4. That the maximum revenue duty should be imposed on luxuries.
5. That all minimum and all specific duties should be abolished and ad valorem duties substituted in their place, care being taken to guard against fraudulent invoices and undervaluation and to assess the duty upon the actual market value.
6. That the duty should be so imposed as to operate as equally as possible throughout the Union, discriminating neither for nor against any class or section.

If we look simply to the question of revenue these propositions clearly enunciate the true doctrine. And in addition to these the Secretary informs us that "experience proves that as a general rule a duty of 20 per cent. ad valorem will yield the largest revenue." To this general rule he says there are a few exceptions above and many below this standard. As a general rule the committee ought to have adopted an ad valorem duty of 20 per cent., and gone more frequently below it than above. The bill they have reported is in all its features a protective tariff instead of a revenue tariff, though an improvement on the present law. There is another object to be kept in view in framing our tariff, not considered by the Secretary in his report and not considered by the committee in framing their bill, and that is, in my opinion, the chief object to be attained, and that is to lighten the burdens of taxation on the people, to increase consumption, to encourage trade and the growth and diffusion of wealth among the masses. To accomplish this some large portion of the necessary revenues must be obtained from other sources and fall on other people. We should not strive to find out the lowest duty that will bring the highest revenue, but fall as far below that as possible, and in doing so whatever loss to the revenue may occur should be supplied from some other source. We should remember that the lower the duties the greater will be the imports, and the greater the imports the greater will be the exports, and greater will be the values made both ways, and greater will be the satisfaction of wants and the enjoyment of comforts.

The tendency of all tariffs is to concentrate wealth in the hands of the few, and it should be prevented from doing so by every possible means. The concentration of the wealth in a nation in the hands of a few produces congestion in business and paralyzes the whole industrial system. This is not all of its pernicious results. It is a menace to free government more dangerous than a standing army, because more insidious. The army is constantly before the eye, and moves toward its purpose upon the surface, where it may be seen and counteracted, but money moves underneath you by sapping and mining and lets down the fabric of government when no eye beholds it. The first question to be considered is how to increase our commerce, or, in other words, how to increase our imports and exports, for as we increase them we buy more and sell more and have more. When we go above 20 per cent. as a general rule we cut down imports, cut down exports, decrease the revenue, lessen consumption, and lessen the comforts of life to the poor, and depress and plunder the labor of the country. When we go below 20 per cent. we decrease the revenue derived by the tariff, but increase our commerce, increase consumption, add to the profits of labor, and produce the largest prosperity to the country. The loss to the revenue could be supplied more justly and more advantageously from other sources.

Let us examine the commercial policy of Great Britain and see how she has built up her enormous foreign trade which is to-day three and a half billions of dollars per annum while ours is only one billion. She has only thirty-two millions of people and we have forty-five. She tried both the protective and the free-trade systems. During the war with Napoleon her exchequer had sunk to the bottom under the heavy duties levied upon her foreign commerce in a vain effort to obtain money; but Pitt displayed as much wisdom in managing her finances as he did her diplomacy. He found her trade expiring under heavy duties. The country was greatly depressed and the revenues disappearing under the fostering care of protection. One-third of her imports were smuggled, the duties being so high that importers preferred running through the whirlpool rather than over the rocks. With a strong hand he cut down the duties, lowering tea from 120 per cent. to 12½. He supplied a large part of the revenue by imposing a tax on incomes. What was the result of this policy? The country and the revenue were soon recuperated, and he soon found money enough in the government coffers not only to defray the expenses of government, but to use lavishly as a powerful auxiliary in his foreign diplomacy. His policy did not look to revenue alone, but he sought to increase consumption by the British people, and that would increase their exports and thus give employment to the people, increase their wealth and the wealth of the nation, bring prosperity to their homes and happiness to their bosoms, and keep the national spirit alive in the terrible struggle in which they were engaged. For present revenues he did not hesitate to lay the hand of taxation on the piles of accumulated wealth.

In 1802 the income tax was abolished and reimposed in 1806, and continued until 1815, when it was again abolished and the burdens of government piled upon the shoulders of consumers. From 1815 until 1840 protection had a feast and the poor had a fast. During that period England passed the darkest night of her financial history. The landed property of the kingdom passed into the hands of a few as did all other kinds of property, and destitution and poverty were left as the inheritance of the poor. In the discussion of the tariff of 1832 Hon. John Bell, of Tennessee, a distinguished leader of the old whig party, opposed the protective policy, and in a speech delivered on the 8th of June of that year thus graphically describes the condition of Great Britain:

At the same period (1821) about 100,000 families were relieved in workhouses, 400,000 were permanently relieved in the common way, and 400,000 during a part of the year, showing that the number of 500,000 families received relief from the public during the whole year and that the whole number receiving relief during part of the year was 900,000, or nearly one-half the population.

In an average of five years, from 1816 to 1821, the population of England and Wales increased 35 per cent. In the same period, by the successful operation of the protective policy, by improvements in machinery and increased skill, the produce of British labor, consisting of manufactures only, more than doubled in quantity, as has already been shown. In the same term of twenty years it has also been shown that the prices of British manufactures fell one-half, or 50 per cent. But, strange as it may appear, it is a well-established fact that the number of paupers increased in the same or in a nearly equal ratio with the increase of production. Thus it is evident that in proportion to the increase of the articles of subsistence and comfort in that country the inhabitants declined in condition. To state the proposition in a different form: in proportion to the increase of the national wealth the mass of the population became more and more impoverished. Whatever increase of consumption took place in England in consequence of increased production was confined to the opulent and independent classes. The whole profits derived from increased labor, increased skill, and increased production went into the pockets of the capitalists. It is scarcely necessary to state that crime and the victims of the gibbet kept equal pace with the progress of paperism. Thus, sir, however inconsistent in terms it may appear, it is demonstrated to be true in fact that the operation of the British protective system has been to increase the two extremes of wealth and poverty. The rich have been made richer and the poor poorer. In proportion as wealth increased in the hands of the few the condition of the many became still more and more degraded.

In what a deplorable condition were the people of Great Britain, and how keenly do we appreciate it now. We are to-day where Great Britain was in 1821, and from precisely the same cause. We have obstructed commerce. We have destroyed values in the hands of the masses. We have cheapened the products of our laborers and increased the value of the products of others. We have destroyed our markets. We have transferred the earnings from the pockets of the millions to the pockets of the few. We have by enormous profits to manufacturers stimulated unnatural growth and production largely in excess of the home markets and destroyed all foreign markets. We have made our people paupers, destroyed all our prosperity, and filled the land with distress, and all for protection! The unhappy condition of Great Britain continued till 1840, when the revenues had again gone down below the requirements for the annual expenditure, and deficiencies were staring the administration in the face in every department of the government. The same condition of affairs will continue with us until we shall remove the causes that produced them, as they did. Our revenues are sinking year by year, and the Secretary of the Treasury informs us there will be a deficiency of eleven millions at the end of the next fiscal year.

How did England extricate herself? Sir Robert Peel adopted Pitt's plan to restore the revenue and bring prosperity again to the people. He reduced the tariff and restored the income tax. What was the result? The deficiencies that were seen from 1841 to 1843 disappeared, and in 1844 there was a surplus of $13,000,000 in the treasury, and it was increased in the following years. The exports of British produce that had fallen from two hundred and sixty millions in 1839 to two hundred and thirty millions in 1842 increased to two hundred and sixty millions in 1843, to two hundred and ninety millions in 1844, and three hundred and thirty millions in 1845. In the last-named year four hundred and thirty articles were stricken from the dutiable list, and in the succeeding year the duties on linen, woolen, cotton, and silk were reduced 50 per cent. In 1849 the corn laws and the navigation laws were abolished. The importation of grain was made free, and free competition for English freights with all vessels was permitted by law. Her protectionists could see nothing but disaster and ruin to her shipping interest, but she has not lost a spar by the abolition. On the contrary, it was a source of strength rather than weakness to her and the amount of freight now earned far exceeds what was received in former years. In 1852 the income tax was again repealed. A tax on wealth is a hard tax to retain. It is so hard to pay, so odious, so inquisitorial, so demoralizing, that there is a constant complaint against it by the few who pay it. It seems to them so much more just that the tax to support the government should all be paid by poor laboring people.

In 1853 Mr. Gladstone, finding Europe disturbed by the accession to the French throne of Napoleon III and requiring a largely increased revenue, began, like Pitt and Peel, by reducing the tariff and reimposing the income tax. He abolished the duty on soap; that brought to the treasury $5,000,000; the duty on tea was reduced over 50 per cent., and duties on all duty-paying articles were cut down and 123 of the 424 duty-paying articles were transferred to the free list. In 1860 "the last anchor of protection" was swept away, and only 65 articles left on the duty-paying list; and to-day there are less than a score, and none of them competing with any British industry. Every dollar of taxation imposed upon the British people goes into the public treasury. What have been the results to her of this policy? Her commerce has been constantly increasing throughout the world. It increased from $1,300,000,000 in 1855 to $2,700,000,000 in 1870 and to $3,500,000,000 in 1877. Mr. Léon Levi, in his history of British commerce, may well say that "a trade of that amount annually by a population of thirty-one millions of people (in 1870) means immense activity, large increase of comforts, and great accumulation of wealth."

The total annual exports of the world are about four and a quarter billions and one-third of that vast amount is exported by British traders from the United Kingdom and British India. The same author says:

Assuming the population of the world to be considerably over a thousand million human beings, that at the very minimum they will require food and clothing to the value of ten pounds ($50) per annum each, and that not more than half that amount is produced in the same countries in which the consumption takes place, the aggregate exports would need to be above five thousand millions (of pounds) worth of produce and goods, whereas they are at present considerably under one thousand million.

So there seems to be no sufficient grounds for the fear that we will be drawn into overtrading by the emancipation of our commerce. How has the increase of English commerce affected the prosperity and happiness of the people? In 1849 5 per cent. of her population were paupers, now only 2 per cent. In 1854 only 2 per cent. of her population attended the primary school, now 8 per cent.; then one person in every thousand was committed for crime, now one in every two thousand; then there were a million and fifty thousand people who had deposits in savings-banks, now a million three hundred and eighty thousand.

In 1862 their property assessed for income amounted to seventeen hundred millions, and three years ago it amounted to twenty-eight hundred millions. In 1840 they consumed 15 pounds of sugar per head, now 41; then 1 pound of tea, now 3; then 42 pounds of wheat, now 124; then 1 pound of butter, now 4, and in the same proportion other articles of daily consumption. Do the advocates of commercial obstruction think these trifling facts? Do they not show a great increase of comforts by the people? Would not the protectionists of Pennsylvania prefer to see their laboring people eating more bread and meat, drinking more coffee and tea, and wearing more comfortable clothes, than to see them transported at Government expense to the wild lands of the West to prevent them from enduring hunger and starvation at home?

We have seen it in the papers that the kind-hearted gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WRIGHT] on Christmas morning stood upon the steps of his door and gave to the poor two thousand loaves of bread. However commendable to the warm and generous heart of the man, the fact that such a condition of things could exist in Pennsylvania to warrant it is a terrible sarcasm on protection. The condition of the working people of the United States to-day under the protective system is in fearful contrast with those of Great Britain under the free-trade system. The people of Great Britain now do a foreign trade of $109 per head and we only $25 per head. If our commerce were as great as that of Great Britain in proportion to population, it would amount to four and three-quarter billions instead of one as it now does. Instead of the gloomy picture of no navy, no shipping, no commerce, we should see our ships plowing all the waters of the earth, carrying our surplus products to exchange for the surplus products of others, giving employment to our people on sea and land.

In contemplating the results to Great Britain of the removal of all restrictions upon her foreign commerce, not the least gratifying feature is the diffusion of wealth among her poorer people. Before she embarked in free trade her wealth grew more slowly and was confined to the few. Now it is spreading among all the poorer people and accumulating with gigantic strides. The income-tax returns show that the number of persons assessed for incomes under $1,500 increased from 1854 to 1870 at the rate of 47 per cent., those from $1,500 to $5,000 at 61 per cent., and those above $5,000 at 63 per cent. In 1811 the people of Great Britain consumed foreign imports to the value of $11 per head. In 1878 their imports had so increased that they consumed over $60 per head. This seems to me a very satisfactory showing for a country of paupers, so called; it is an increase in consumption of 9 per cent. per head annually of foreign products. How is it with us under the beneficent (?) influences of protection? In 1860, the last year of low tariffs, we consumed foreign imports at the rate of $11 per head, and in 1877, after sixteen years of protection, we consumed $10 per head! While the national wealth increased over 100 per cent. the capacity of the people to satisfy their wants decreased!

This is exactly what occurred in Great Britain under protection, as stated by Mr. Bell in his speech before referred to. What a contrast between England under free trade and the United States under protection! While England increased her wealth 41 per cent. per head her people increased their capacity to satisfy their wants 600 per cent. per head. How are these foreign paupers able to live so highly while our protected laborers are fighting hunger at their doors, and over twenty thousand form one congressional district in Pennsylvania petitioning the Government to furnish them aid in fleeing from their homes to escape starvation? In 1850, under low tariffs, we consumed under \$6 per head of the products of foreign countries, and in 1879 had increased our consumption nearly 100 per cent. and the national wealth about 100 per cent. This was during a decade of the lowest tariffs we have ever had, and these figures show that the growth of that wealth was general throughout the land. In 1870, after ten years of high tariffs, the scene had changed materially. The national wealth had increased over 90 per cent., but the consumption of foreign goods only increased 5 per cent. per head— $\frac{1}{4}$ of 1 per cent. per annum.

The wealth of the country is increasing rapidly, but it is in the hands of the few, while poverty is the inheritance of the many. England exported $30 per capita in 1861 and we $7, and she exported $43 per capita in 1877 and we $13, and a large portion of ours to pay a foreign debt. The strange feature in all this odious system of free trade is that the English paupers sell four times and buy six times as much as we. The reason of this is they make more money by their free and unfettered labor than we do with our shackles on and use that money to purchase the comforts of life.

England took her taxation off of consumption, labor, and poverty and laid its exactions at the doors of wealth. For nearly forty years she has clung to that policy, and it has made her the most powerful nation in the world and her people the most prosperous and happy. England would consume more of our exports if we would take her exports in payment, and at much lower rates than we can get similar articles at home. She buys in the markets of the world one hundred millions of bushels of wheat every year, but we only supply forty of it; why may we not supply the other sixty? She buys fifteen hundred million pounds of cotton; but we only supply nine hundred; why may we not supply the other six? Only because we cannot under the tariff take her products in exchange and other countries will. She takes our exports just in proportion as we take hers. After exchanging with us to the extent of forty millions of bushels, she has to offer her wares elsewhere and finds them accepted by Russia, Germany, France, and other countries.

If we would remove the restrictions on our commerce it would grow just as the English commerce did. In 1852-'53 we had restrictions on our commerce with the Dominion of Canada, and our trade amounted to twenty millions. The next year a treaty of reciprocity was made, and the trade rose to thirty-three and a half millions, and continued to increase year by year till in 1866, when the treaty was repealed, it was eighty-four millions. The year after the repeal and the reimposition of the tariff, the trade fell from eighty-four to fifty-eight millions; and in 1877, eleven years after the repeal of the treaty and the large increase of wealth and population, and yet the trade was not as great as it was in 1866. We have the same results in our commerce with the Hawaiian Islands. In 1876, under tariff restrictions, our trade with them amounted to two millions annually. The year after their removal by treaty of reciprocity our trade was nearly four mil-ions. It had increased 100 per cent. in one year. If to-day we could sweep all restrictions from our commerce and make it as free as the air, in one year our trade with foreign countries would amount to two billions of dollars instead of one; and in ten years we would have the largest commerce and the most prosperous people in the world.

How can we unfetter our commerce and obtain means sufficient to support the Government? We cannot levy direct taxes except in proportion to population, and that would be as odious, unjust, and oppressive as the tariff. Taxes should not be imposed in proportion to people, but in proportion to property. "Direct taxes" must be excluded from our plan. What are they? A capitation tax and tax on land. All other property in the country is at the disposal of Congress, and the sources of revenue are sufficiently large. The committee could have imposed duties at 20 per cent. as a general rule, making a few exceptions above that standard and many below, and raised one hundred millions, instead of one hundred and forty-one. The next year the same duties would bring one hundred and twenty millions, because the imports would be largely increased by the low duties. Our policy should be to take the smallest amount of taxes that we can by customs, and we should gradually decrease the amount until our customs taxes come alone from non-competing articles entering our custom-houses.

Our expenditures require two hundred and fifty millions annually, including the sinking fund, or two hundred and twenty millions excluding it. If we raise one hundred millions with the tariff we have only to raise one hundred and fifty by other means. We now have over a hundred millions from whisky and tobacco and other internal taxes, but they are on the same principle as the tariff taxes on consumption, and fall on the poor and should be largely decreased. Not over seventy-five millions should be raised from these sources. We lack yet seventy-five millions. Where is it to come from? There are two hundred and fifty thousand people in the United States who have an annual income of eight hundred millions. It would not be unjust to require of them the whole sum. It is the fairest tax that can be imposed. It comes out of clear profits, while a tax on consumption denies bread to the mouth and clothing to the back of the poor.

The income tax raised in 1866 about sixty millions. Those having incomes over $5,000 paid thirty-four millions, and the same class can to-day easily pay forty millions, and that amount should be required of them. There are five billions of railroad property in the United States, enjoying an income of one hundred and eighty-five millions. It paid an income tax in 1866 over $11,000,000, and could easily pay ten millions now. Insurance companies paid in 1866 two millions in income taxes, and can easily do the same to-day. Brokers, on sales of stocks and bonds, foreign exchange, and gold, paid in 1866 three and a half millions, and can do so again. There are two billions invested in manufactures in the United States, and they paid in 1866 over a hundred millions. It would not be oppressive to tax them ten millions now. Telegraph and express companies paid in 1866 one million, and can do it again. The tax on banks and other miscellaneous taxes bring us now eighteen millions, and by correcting the exemptions of savings banks two millions more may be obtained from the five hundred millions deposited and paying no taxes. There are seventeen hundred millions invested in bonds that should pay a tax, and could easily pay a tax of $10,000,000, and it ought to be deducted from the hundred millions of interest we pay their owners annually.

Why may not a sufficient amount of money be obtained from all these sources to support the Government without destroying our commerce, destroying our labor, banishing our prosperity, and making our people poor, wretched, and miserable? Let the people of the United States answer these questions.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. SOUTHARD addressed the House on the subject of the resumption of specie payments. [His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

TRANSFER OF INDIAN BUREAU TO WAR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, I arise to address the House upon the bill providing for the transfer of the Indian Bureau to the War Department, profoundly impressed with the importance of the question it involves and the grave responsibility which its consideration and proper solution imposes upon me and the other members of this body. When it is considered that the practical operation of this or any other measure for the regulation and conduct of our Indian affairs affects and controls the well-being, civilization, and even the very existence under any conditions of a whole race of people, it will be readily conceded by every thinking man upon this floor and throughout the country without regard to party distinctions, that it should be most carefully examined, calmly and dispassionately discussed, before it receives the stamp of legislative sanction or disapproval. It should not be considered as a measure of partisan legislation nor as a mere experiment in governmental policy with no higher aim or purpose in view than to test the excellence of some particular theory in comparison with others as measured by the standard of economy, expediency, or convenience, but it should be looked at from a higher stand-point, commanding a survey of the entire field of policy and legislation back in the past and far in the future which is included within its scope.

That the members of this House should differ so widely in their judgment and opinions upon a measure of the significance and importance which attaches to this one, and which is both favored and opposed by influences so respectable and reasons so cogent, is what might be expected and excites no surprise. While the differences in opinion exist, however, it is gratifying to know that they are defined by no party lines and arise from no sectional prejudices, but that they are engendered and grow out of honest convictions that have led minds equally candid and sincere to divergent conclusions. When a bill very similar to this one was offered in the Forty-fourth Congress—with the examination which I had then given the subject and the convictions I then had—I deemed it my duty to oppose it, but a closer study and more thorough understanding of the question it presented has led me to the conclusion that I should, perhaps, have pursued a different course. Candor compels me to say, however, that I am not giving my support to the present bill because I believe it to be the best one that could have been framed for the purpose, nor because it in any way meets the approval of my judgment, except as it is commended to me in the aspect of a choice between evils.

I confess that it is a matter of but little concern what particular methods are adopted or what special agencies are selected to carry out in detail any measure which may be proposed having reference to the Indian tribes upon our borders, unless it is intended to change the whole theory and policy of the Government in that respect. It is not therefore so much for the purpose of urging the passage of this bill that I address the House to-day as to denounce the false and wicked system of legislation upon this subject which has for a hundred years and more been a curse to the Indians and a shame to the white people of this country. It will not be denied that the policy and conduct of this Government toward the Indian race from the day when the white man first set his foot upon the shores of the New World down to the present hour have been marked by horrors, crimes, and outrages that shock the Christian sentiments of all mankind. No page of history records such gigantic wrongs, such scenes of murder, rapine, and outrage as we have perpetrated against these helpless and defenseless people. Our whole conduct toward them has been marked by a greed that knew no bounds, a rapacity that has never been staid, and a cruelty more ferocious than savages ever inflicted upon their enemies. We have pursued them with fire and sword from the shores of the Atlantic to the frozen regions of the Rocky Mountains, seizing their vast domain without compensation, driving them without scruple from their ancient homes, over the graves of their fathers, with apparently the constant purpose in view of their final and utter extermination.

In this march of violence, lawless conquest, and crime, we have violated every law, human and divine, outraged every principle of justice and humanity, and brought disgrace and reproach upon a Government that boasts of its greatness, progress, and enlightened civilization. If it be the purpose of the Government to continue this monstrous policy until the extinction of the race is accomplished, then it is wiser, cheaper, and more humane to select and put in operation the agencies that will attain this end as quickly as possible, and in that view, if in no other, I should advocate this measure. As an engine of sure and speedy destruction, an army of armed men would be more effective than a horde of robbers and murderers that will effect the purpose only slowly by deceit, false pretenses, plunder, and eventually death from starvation, and the vices which they originate and teach. For thirty years past the latter agents have been employed and the result is before the country, in a story of constantly recurring wars, wide-spread corruption, and debauchery in an important branch of the public service and a cost to the Government of more than $400,000,000. That the work of pillage and murder has been well done, there can be no question, but the process is too slow and expensive; hence the necessity of selecting other and more speedy methods.

If the shadow of national death is still to hang over the Indians, if they are still to be followed up with the same relentless ferocity and cruel rapacity which has already bereft them of four-fifths of a great continent, destroyed nine-tenths of their race, and inflicted upon the remainder all the vices and taught them none of the virtues of civilization, then we should only look to the instrumentality most ready and convenient of use. If the decree of extermination which has gone forth against the Indians is to be irrevocable, and if it is the settled purpose of this Government to execute it, then, sir, let the terrible tragedy be enacted as quickly as possible. Do not protract the agony through another century of slow, wasting, cruel torture to the Indian and of shame and disgrace to ourselves. Do not stand still and see an entire race through long years of intolerable misery melt away with famine and want and the terrible diseases which the white man's civilization has planted everywhere among them.

The heartless, cruel process of total extinction has been protracted too long. Let us finish the work, commenced so many years ago, by a sharp and decisive stroke. Send the Army out over the plains and into the fastnesses of the mountains, to strike down and destroy the Indians of every age and sex until not one of that unfortunate people shall be left to tell the melancholy story of their wrongs, their sufferings, and of the least crime that has been committed against them, their destruction. Let their very name be forgotten among men and the record of their existence pass from history, and then let us, if we can, blot from the memory of mankind the shameful part we have played in this horrid drama of human woe, this appalling crime against civilization and the teachings of Christianity. Thus to end at once and forever this long, lingering agony with which a powerful civilization has afflicted a rude and defenseless people for so many years will be a mercy to the Indians and a relief to the Christian sentiment of the country, which has so long been shocked by the monstrous barbarity of our conduct toward them.

With our refined ideas of Christian civilization we have looked with horror upon the cruelties sometimes practiced by the Indians upon those of our race who have fallen into their hands and been made the victims of their savage vengeance, but we have been blind to the cruelties, wrongs, and persecutions which provoked the savages to this stern and terrible system of retaliation. Our histories of Indian wars and outbreaks abound with graphic, startling pictures of wretched captives of the white race, bound to stakes and writhing in flames, but no historian has recorded in truthful terms the dark story of wrong which has brought the savage to inflict this frightful retribution upon those who were in some measure answerable for their perpetration. These savage acts naturally shock the feelings and arouse the passions of civilized men, when Indians are the actors, but when compared with the slow, yet constant torture with which we have for three centuries been gradually diminishing their numbers from more than five millions to less than three hundred thousand, the balance is not so much against the untutored savage as our civilized historians would lead us to believe.

It is a sad truth, but one abundantly proven to the satisfaction of every one who thinks fairly and impartially by facts and results that cannot be denied, that the policy of the white man toward the Indians of this country in wickedness and oppression has no parallel in the annals of history. Even in the darker ages of the world, when mankind were instigated by savage passions, the love of conquest or the lust of gain, to wage war upon each other, there is no authentic instance to be found where one race of people has pursued another to the extreme of total extinction, but it was reserved for one of the most powerful, progressive, and enlightened nations of modern times to present this anomaly in history and to inaugurate this horrid theory of progress.

I do not charge the long catalogue of crimes I have recounted to any party that has administered the Government, nor to any particular agency alone which has heretofore had charge of this department of the public service, but it is a sin which rests upon our whole people, and for which all parties and all agencies are equally responsible.

I am frank to admit that under the system now proposed many of the wrongs and abuses in the management of our Indian affairs which calls so loudly for redress had an existence and were fostered and encouraged for a long period of time, but under the one which succeeded it and which is now in force they have been increased and aggravated a hundred-fold, so that while no one of the evils of earlier origin has been removed a thousand new ones have been added to the list. When the Indian Bureau was formerly under the control of the War Department it was conducted better in this respect, at least. The petty pilfering, shoddy contracts, and general system of thieving and rascality which it is conceded now exists was in a measure unknown. The Indians were perhaps not so gently cared for and their rights so carefully preserved and protected as they should have been, yet the expenditure was not so lavish nor the irregularities so great as they have since grown to be.

I am free to grant that soldiers are not the best educators that could be selected to teach Indians the lessons of virtue, Christianity, and civilization, but if they are not so well qualified to teach them these things, neither are they so likely to teach them treachery, deceit, and robbery as their present guardians of the Interior Department, whose amazing villainies would astound the sturdiest felon. I have made a careful examination and comparison of both the systems of dealing with Indian affairs adopted at different times by the Government, and while both deserve unmeasured reprobation, I find that in every respect the one now proposed is preferable to the existing one. I am aware that it has been claimed upon high authority that to transfer the control of Indian affairs to the War Department means war instead of peace with the Indians, tumult instead of quiet, and finally the complete subjection of the Indian tribes by force of arms or their entire extermination. I deny that any such result would necessarily follow, but on the contrary these evils might be to a very great extent avoided, unless it should be a purpose of the Government to bring them about.

And I am supported in this belief, not only by the experience of the past but by the testimony of nearly every officer of the Army who has spoken upon that subject as well as by almost every one else at all acquainted with the Indian character, except those who have gone among them as agents, speculators, and contractors under the present system.

In 1849 the control of Indian affairs was transferred from the Department of War to the Department of the Interior, and for the thirty years that they have remained under the direction of the latter I think it can be easily shown that there have been more Indian disturbances, a larger and more wasteful expenditure of public money and with fewer good results, than during any former period. It is true that Indian wars were of frequent occurrence previous to this time and that large sums of money were expended in their prosecution, but then it must be remembered that the Indians were vastly superior in numbers to what they are now; that during most of the years preceding 1849 many of the Southern and Western States were in a great part held by large and warlike tribes, and that these were reduced to subjection and removed westward of the Mississippi River previous to the transfer of the Indian question to the Interior Department. Four of the largest and most powerful of these tribes were placed upon a reservation west of the Arkansas, and have adopted the habits and customs of civilization under a stable government organized and conducted by themselves and which is suited to their social and political wants.

I have no data at hand from which I can estimate all the cost of conducting our Indian affairs and prosecuting our Indian wars during the period when the matter was exclusively under the control of the War Department. No doubt it was a vast amount, and I have no question but that much of it was needlessly and uselessly expended; but it will scarcely be pretended that any great portion was stolen by dishonest agents of the Government in so open and shameless a manner as is practiced at the present day. Whatever may have been the expenditures, faults, or crimes of any and all previous systems for the management of Indian affairs, it is scarcely possible that any which has ever existed, or may hereafter be devised, could be worse than or even half so bad as the present one. I have no disposition to speak harshly of any one, though justified in doing so by the most abundant cause; but I feel it a duty of the highest and most imperative character to denounce to the whole American people the brutal and unchristian conduct which has for years and is now being pursued toward the Indian race, and to hold up to the execration of all mankind the heartless miscreants who are every day perpetrating so many crimes against them and practicing so many frauds upon the Government. I am not the accuser of these base and unprincipled vampires. The story of their villainies is told by a thousand tongues and is recorded upon every page of Indian history for a quarter of a century past.

As ministers of peace, let us see how the agents of our Indian Bureau have succeeded. At the time they assumed control of Indian affairs profound quiet prevailed all along the line of our Indian frontier, and for a decade of years there was no serious disturbances between the white and the red man upon our borders, but the exactions, frauds, and deceptions which they soon began to practice finally drove the savages to madness and then to war. So in 1852 and 1854 the Sioux war, with all its horrors and savage outrages, burst upon the northwestern frontier, and which required the use of the Army for two years to conquer a peace at the cost of many hundreds of lives and $40,000,000. Then followed, in 1864, the war with the Cheyennes, the inception and moving cause of which was the most devilish and diabolical crime ever before conceived by either savages or civilized men. The Cheyennes were a small tribe living in perfect peace and quiet in the northern part of Colorado Territory. In 1864, when the war between the States was being waged with terrible fury, a regiment of Colorado volunteers invaded their country and commenced an indiscriminate pillage and massacre of their people without giving the slightest warning of their bloody purpose; and finally, when they sought protection under the flag of the United States, their savage pursuers charged like demons among them and slew men, women, and children with a brutal ferocity never equaled by the most barbarous Indian tribes.

Upon a subsequent investigation of this cowardly and horrid massacre, the fact was disclosed that the bloodthirsty poltroons who perpetrated it were instigated to the monstrous crime solely by a desire to incite an Indian war in order that they might not be called to the field to fight for the maintenance of the Union, against a foe from whom more danger might have been apprehended than from a handful of unarmed and fleeing savages. I do not refer to this shameful butchery alone for the purpose of illustrating the inefficiency of our present vicious Indian system nor to demonstrate the superiority of the one proposed, though it might constitute some part of the argument to prove that proposition, but I mention it in support of what I have already said in reference to the faults of our entire policy in that respect. It would hardly be credited that civilized men in this age of the world could have been guilty of such a crime, unless it were proven by the most conclusive and overwhelming testimony. That testimony is found in the report of Major E. W. Wynkoop, the commanding officer at Fort Lyon, Wyoming Territory, under date of January 15, 1865, in which he says:

The affidavits of many persons show and agree in the statement that the most fearful atrocities were committed that were ever heard of. Women and children were killed and scalped, children shot at their mother's breast, and all the bodies mutilated in the most horrible manner. Numerous eye-witnesses have described to me scenes of the most disgusting and horrible character: the dead bodies of females profaned in such a manner that the recital is sickening.

All this, and more equally horrible, was testified to by numerous witnesses, whose truth there is no reason to doubt. No wonder the Indian should hate and detest a people that could be guilty of such a crime, and bear a fierce and implacable hostility to a government that would sanction and approve it by not inflicting upon the guilty perpetrators a merited punishment.

Following this came the war with the Sioux Indians of Dakota, which was equally unprovoked, attended with similar horrors, though not in such horrid and diabolical form.

Then came the war with the Navajos, in which more butcheries and massacres occurred and resulted well-nigh in the entire destruction of the tribe.

Then came the Sioux war of 1876, and the massacre by the Indians, this time of the gallant Custer's command, upon the banks of the Big Horn, and lastly the war with the Nez Percés, which is not yet ended. So that to-day under the so-called peace policy some part of nearly every tribe in the Northwest are engaged in hostilities with the Government or awaiting a favorable opportunity to engage in the conflict and avenge their wrongs. These wars that I have enumerated do not embrace one-half of the outbreaks and disturbances that have occurred. To recite them all with their attendant horrors would fill a volume so sickening in detail and so monstrous in the iniquities that it would disclose that Christians, civilized people, would be amazed by its perusal. I might add to the dark and bloody story an account of the shameful and fiendish massacre of an entire village of Oregon Indians, consisting of old men, women, and children, when they were wholly defenseless and a large number of them were sick with the small-pox. While in this condition, apprehending no harm save from the terrible plague which afflicted them, a detachment of American soldiers, belonging to a race of Christian, civilized people and led by an educated officer of the regular Army, marched stealthily in the night-time upon this undefended village and, without a single sentiment of pity or humanity, mercilessly slew the wretched, plague-stricken inhabitants of every age and sex, though the distress and sufferings of their situation should have appealed to the gentlest sympathies of the human heart.

And I might also tell of the war with the Modocs; how it was provoked by the most cruel and wanton injustice; how nearly the whole of that brave tribe was exterminated and their chief murdered when he had laid down his arms after the white man's manner of conducting Indian wars and dealing with Indian captives.

It may be said that if officers of the Army committed these crimes (for they were crimes of the most shocking character) it would furnish a very good argument why the Army should not be entrusted with the conduct of Indian affairs; but I answer that this is not so, for the disturbances which set the Army in motion were brought about by the improper workings of the civil agencies; and then the Army has to be kept on the scene anyway whether in sole control of matters on the border or merely subordinate to the worthless and inefficient agents of the Indian Bureau. And the Army and its officers must be taught respect for the wiser and more humane policy which I trust a more Christian public sentiment will soon compel the Government to adopt.

An accurate computation of the enormous cost of all this needless strife and bloodshed is impossible, but it may be safely estimated at more than three hundred millions of dollars. I will not undertake to say that some of these wars and disturbances would not have occurred and some of this vast sum of money would not have been expended if the Indian management had been under control of the War Department during the period mentioned, but I do say that there is the strongest reason to believe that the wars would have been fewer and the expenditure less if such had been the case.

Many witnesses have been examined upon this subject, and they concur almost unanimously in the belief that every Indian war for the past fifteen years at least has been provoked by the inefficiency, rapacity, and dishonesty of the agents in charge of Indian affairs. Among these witnesses I may mention Major-General Pope, Brigadier-General Carlton, Major Wynkoop, and the veteran mountaineer and plainsman, Colonel Christopher Carson, who spent nearly his entire life among the Indian tribes of the West.

The methods by which Indian agents, contractors, post-traders, and others sent out by the Indian Bureau, defrauded the Government, cheated and deceived the Indians and enriched themselves, are so curious and unique and were carried into effect with such boldness and ingenuity that it is difficult to tell which most excites our wonder, their amazing villainy or astounding hardihood and assurance.

A glance at some of their operations will demonstrate the correctness of this conclusion. On the 2d day of March, 1865, the two Houses of Congress created by resolution a joint committee charged with the duty of inquiring into the condition of the Indian tribes and their treatment by the civil and military authorities of the United States. This committee subsequently made a report, after a thorough investigation of the subject, which revealed a condition of affairs in the Indian Bureau and its mode of conducting its business which should at once have brought about its entire abolition. And while I do not coincide with all the views which they expressed or the conclusions which they reached, they satisfied me entirely that no more corrupt, faulty, or vicious system could exist than the one under which Indian affairs are at present managed.

Some of the operations of these Indian agents are of a somewhat amusing character, and serve to relieve the eye while contemplating the darker picture of their more heinous rascality. Senator Nesmith, a member of the committee to which I have referred, thus speaks of the doings of some of these worthies:

Another great cause of complaint is the worthless quality of the goods which are bought in the Atlantic States and sent out for distribution among the Indians. From the personal inspection which I have given these goods, and on comparing them with the invoices, I am thoroughly convinced that the contractors are guilty of the most outrageous and systematic swindling and robbery. Their actions can be properly characterized by no other terms. There is evidence also that the persons employed in the Department to make the purchases are accomplices in these crimes. I have examined invoices of purchases made by the Department or its agents in Eastern cities, where the prices charged were from 50 to 100 per cent. above the market value of good articles. Upon an examination of them, were "steel spades," made of sheet iron; "chopping axes," which were purely cast-iron; "best brogans," with paper soles; "blankets," made of shoddy and glue, which came to shreds the first time they were wet, &c.

No doubt the Senator was convinced, as any other honest man would have been from the facts he relates, that the "Indian contractors and agents" are guilty of the most "outrageous and systematic swindling and robbery;" and nobody will doubt that he selected the proper terms to designate the character of their conduct. No milder words than swindling and robbery could have been truthfully used in describing the nature of these transactions. The worst feature of the matter is revealed in the statement "that there is evidence to show that persons employed in the Department to make the purchases are accomplices in these crimes." So it seems that this corruption, fraud, and rascality exists in one of the great Departments of the Government, and extends from the national capital all the way to the western plains. If the "swindling and robbery" denounced by Senator Nesmith had only been committed by contractors, speculators, and others owing no official obligation to the Government, the case would not have been so bad; but when sworn officers and agents of the Government are the accomplices and confederates of public plunderers, it becomes a crime of appalling turpitude.

The gentlemen who conducted the operations referred to certainly evinced no little enterprise and ingenuity in prosecuting their nefarious scheme, and are entitled to a forward position in the ranks of the most distinguished of shoddy cheats and thieves. No common operators would have undertaken or succeeded in palming off "sheet-iron" spades and "cast-iron" axes for the genuine article which the Government contracted to purchase, nor ventured upon the experiment of furnishing "brogan shoes" with "paper soles" and "blankets held together with glue;" but such achievements exhibit an experience and ability in rascality as well as nerve and audacity which none but veterans in this line of business could have acquired. Men who could perpetrate such impudent frauds must be possessed of both a cheek and conscience very like the material of their axes and spades. But perhaps they may have considered that as spades are implements for which Indians could have no possible use even if disposed to handle them, it was not a matter of much concern what kind they were supplied with, and that as under the present management the Indians are not much accustomed to use axes for any purpose except to scalp white men, they perhaps thought it better that they should be made of the least dangerous material.

Under the teachings, however, of the so-called peace agents and the habits of idleness and debauchery which have been inculcated by their example and have grown up with their system, it is not likely that the Indians will know by actual use within the next fifty years what materials enter into the manufacture of any article of industry or manual labor. But these are only small specimens of the frauds practiced in the purchase of Indian supplies, as will appear from a further examination of the testimony on this subject.

Senator Nesmith examined other invoices which contained a list of many curious articles purchased by Indian agents and contractors, the practical uses of which in the education and advancement of the Indians would be extremely difficult to discover. For instance, take the following:

Many articles—

Says that gentleman—

are purchased which would be utterly useless to the Indians if their quality was ever so good, such as iron spoons, mirrors, gimlets, Jew's-harps, hair-oil, finger-rings; and in one case which came under my observation forty dozen pairs of elastic garters were sent out to one tribe in which there was not a single pair of stockings.

Doubtless some of these articles were attractive to the ladies and children of the tribe, especially the mirrors, hair-oil, finger-rings, and Jew's-harps; but to clothe the belles in elastic garters alone without stockings would scarcely conform to the requirements of fashionable life, even in the wilderness; and to equip the braves with "cast-iron axes and gimlets" would not fit them very well for either the war-path or the avocations of peaceful husbandry. From the same report we learn that "one agent made a requisition for small steel plows" and they sent him "fancy mirrors." He asked for "harness for ponies" and they sent him "frying-pans" and "knitting-needles." He asked for "axes and grain-cradles" and they responded with "scissors and iron spoons." Perhaps the knitting-needles furnished in this latter invoice was designed to enable the Indian ladies to supply by their industry the omission of stockings in the former one, to be worn with the garters, which had already been sent in such large quantities, and possibly too scissors and iron spoons were thought to be more harmless and quite as useful as cast-iron axes.

It may have been concluded, also, by these quick-witted Indian purveyors that frying-pans would supply a better purpose than pony harness and grain-cradles. Cast-iron axes and iron spoons seem to have been a choice commodity with these Indian contractors, for we find in another place that one invoice of goods contained as many as six iron spoons for each Indian in the tribe, while in another case a large number of ax-handles were sent to a distant tribe, at heavy cost, without a single ax!

Whatever may be said, however, about the quality of the goods furnished to the Indians, no complaint can be made as to their abundant variety; for glancing over the invoices we find them to contain almost every imaginable article except such as would be of any practical benefit or use to the Indians, and all furnished at the most enormous and extravagant prices. I shall not undertake to maintain that some abuses of this character would not exist if the Indian Bureau were transferred to the War Department as is proposed by this bill, but I scarcely think it probable that educated Army officers would be found making requisitions for spoons, gimlets, hair-oil, Jew's-harps, and such like articles for the use of the Indians, and they would certainly have a better idea of the fitness of things than to give them handles without axes, elastic garters without stockings, and frying-pans without rations.

But if the frauds and peculations in the Indian Bureau were confined to the purchasing and delivering to the Indians worthless, shoddy articles of clothing, and mechanical and agricultural implements of a kind and quality totally useless to them, the villainy would not be so enormous and unpardonable; but the provisions furnished for their support, as has been shown by abundant testimony, were more inferior than any other character of Indian supplies. To compel the Government to pay the most exorbitant prices for iron spades, shoddy blankets, gimlets, ax-handles, and iron spoons, and then compel the Indians to receive them at the same extravagant valuation is an offense against honesty and fair dealing that should receive the severest punishment; but to poison these poor creatures with unsound and tainted food is a horrible crime, for which its authors should answer upon the scaffold.

It has been shown in investigation directed by Congress, by testimony too emphatic and trustworthy to be doubted, that at many of the agencies where large numbers of Indians had been collected by order of the Indian Bureau or Commissioner the provisions furnished were not only far too scant in quantity to meet the demand, but so inferior in quality as to be unfit for human consumption. Moldy bread alive with vermin, flour and meal musty with age and exposure to weather, and tainted meat so far decomposed as to give out the most offensive odor before being removed even from the barrels and boxes in which it had been shipped, constituted the major part of many invoices of provisions. Fresh meat was supplied from the putrid flesh of beef-cattle slaughtered when nearly dead from starvation or disease and issued as rations to the hungry multitude. This loathsome, repulsive food, upon which wild animals would hardly banquet and from which vultures of the air would almost wing their flight in disgust, the Indians were compelled to eat or starve. If they complained it only brought curses, insults, and abuse, for the heartless knaves who had them in charge seem to have had neither mercy, honesty, nor conscience, and paid no heed to the demands of justice or the piteous supplications of helpless suffering. Shivering in their shoddy blankets before the freezing winter winds that sweep from icy mountains across the western plains and starving of hunger or sickening and dying from unwholesome food, the Indians have experienced all the horrors of cold and famine, and it is not surprising that they should leave their agency and go in quest of game to relieve the pangs of hunger.

But they are not permitted this poor resort, for no sooner do they leave the bounds of their prison than they are declared to be "hostiles," and the soldiers are sent out to hunt them down, bring them back disarmed to camp, and then if the Indian, exasperated to madness by this tyranny and wrong, makes the least resistance he is shot down like a wild beast. Forthwith an Indian war is proclaimed, and the work of butchery and destruction begins. Just such things as this, added to the perfidy of violated promises, broken treaties, and lawless invasion of their reservations, have precipitated half the Indian wars in the West that have occurred in the past fifteen years, and notably the Sioux war, which ended with the destruction of General Custer's command and the wonderful retreat of Sitting Bull and his escape across the line to Canada.

When we look at the cheats, frauds, robberies, and rascalities of Indian agents and contractors, the reproach they have brought on the Government and the evil they have wrought the Indians, one cannot forbear the wish that they had composed the little army that followed Custer in his fatal conflict with the stern chief of the Sioux, so that the latter might have carried some of their scalps as trophies of war with him into the domain of his mother, the British Queen. And the thought comes unbidden that if he should recross the border into his own country again, followed by any considerable number of his trusty braves, our good and patriotic President might invite them to Washington and utilize them with great public benefit in carrying out his cherished theory of civil-service reform.

If these adventurous savages could only have free entry into the Interior Department and be turned loose with their tomahawks and scalping-knives among the attachés of the Indian Bureau, they could accomplish more satisfactory results in reforming that branch of the civil service in one hour than could be attained in a whole lifetime by the utmost efforts of our metaphysical Cabinet minister who conducts that branch of the Government. If they were allowed to set up their stake in the corridors of the Interior building and roast some of the rascals who have been robbing their people so long, it would have a most wholesome effect in the future conduct of our Indian affairs. While it has been shown by the most indubitable proof that nearly every article furnished the Indians which it was proper and necessary for them to have was of the most inferior and worthless kind, it is equally well proven that they have been furnished in abundant quantities with arms and ammunition of the most approved pattern with which to fight our soldiers and slaughter defenseless settlers on the border. In nearly every conflict with the western Indians, they were found to be better armed than the soldiers of the Government, with weapons and ammunition manufactured in our own arsenals, so that when driven by starvation and other wrongs to make war upon the whites they are first supplied with means for its successful and efficient prosecution.

Our present Indian system is a most complex and awkwardly constructed concern, the power to control and operate it being vested in the head of the Interior Department, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and a body styled the board of Indian commissioners, the latter having been created by act of Congress approved April 10, 1869, and is composed of nine persons, appointed by the President. It is, in my judgment, a proper subject of inquiry whether the large expense attendant upon the creation and continuance of this board is not largely inadequate to any good that it has or may accomplish in the discharge, however faithfully, of any functions which legitimately pertain to it. The most important duty with which it seems to be charged is to keep a vigilant watch over the Indian Bureau, to prevent as far as possible the frauds that are confessedly practiced and to eradicate the evils which are known to exist in that Department. How far it has succeeded in accomplishing this object after nine years of experiment let its chairman tell in the conclusion of his report for the year 1877:

INDIAN RINGS.

The belief is almost universal that the transactions of the Indian Bureau are tainted with fraud in every part, and that it is incumbent upon those who manage the Department to "break up the Indian ring," which is presumed to be enriched by the Government spoils. The idea of breaking up "rings," so long as the Government is a purchaser of supplies to the extent of millions annually, is a fallacy, and it should at once be dismissed from the public mind. Contractors would be more or less than human if, in view of operations of such magnitude, they did not enter into combinations or preconceived plans whereby they could obtain the best possible prices for their commodities. Such has ever been the case and ever will be, not only in this but in every other Government department which is under the necessity of contracting for large amounts. The most that can reasonably be expected of the Department officers is that every means available shall be used to detect fraudulent schemes and protect the Treasury and the Indians against the rapacity of contractors. It is in this direction especially that this board has endeavored to assist the Government in its pressing need, and, it may be fairly claimed, with a good degree of success. The measure of its efficiency must depend, manifestly, upon the degree of cordiality which may be maintained between it and the officers of the Department; for if the two work at cross-purposes both are sure to be hindered in their respective spheres of action.

Here we have the confession that the board of Indian commissioners has utterly failed of its mission, that the shameless debauchery which pervades our entire Indian system is incurable, and that rings and corruption in the administration of the Indian Bureau are evils which no remedy can reach.

No more emphatic condemnation of the present policy could be pronounced, for I cannot agree with the Commissioner in his conclusion that these abuses are unavoidable, nor can I accept as true the philosophy that there is a necessity for their longer endurance. Neither can I recognize as a fallacy the idea of breaking up rings and purifying the public service any more than I can agree with him in the opinion that the hope of doing so should be dismissed from the public mind, though I am frank to admit that if there is any single reform which may be regarded as hopeless it is most likely to be found in that one looking to the conversion of Indian agents into honest men. As such an undertaking does not promise any desirable results, the remedy easiest of application and most effective in its operation would be to adopt a system which will dispense with their further service.

I would not be understood as including all persons connected with the Indian service in the band of thieves and plunderers whose crimes have made it a reproach to the nation, for no doubt many honest and upright men have held positions in the Indian Bureau who have discharged their duties with scrupulous fidelity; but their number has been so small, and the system itself is so faulty and vicious, that they have been powerless to prevent the frauds and villainies that have been perpetrated under it. And I know that thousands of Christian men and women, animated by the broadest philanthropy and the highest and purest aims, have labored with a zeal and devotion that knew no limit to change the hideous, savage policy of the Government which has doomed the Indians to ceaseless outrage and utter extermination at a day near in the future. But until a stronger power than the Indian Bureau stands by to aid them in their good work, and drive back the ravenous horde of lawless marauders that carry debauchery, pestilence, and death to the Indians, the temples they erect will be profaned and the flowers of peace and civilization planted by Christian hands in the wilderness will wither and die.

I have had time to point out only a few of the evils and bad results that have attended the workings of our Indian system since it has been under control of one of the civil departments of the Government, and to show how far it has failed as an agency of peace and civilization. In the matter of economy its record is equally disparaging. I have not been able to examine this phase of the subject in detail, but these items and comparisons I gather from the able report of the Committee on Indian Affairs. From this I learn that there are eighty-two Indian agencies, which cost the Government in the aggregate $802,907 annually for salaries of employes alone, without including the salaries paid the clerks, laborers, and messengers employed in the Indian Bureau here in Washington, and as these latter compose a small army of themselves, the amount paid them must constitute another very considerable item of expense. I find in the sum I have mentioned one item of $9,000 for salaries of three inspectors at large. What particular duty is assigned to these officials I am not advised, and am therefore left to the conjecture that it may be to examine and pass upon the quality of cast-iron axes, shoddy blankets, frying-pans, iron spoons, hair-oil, &c., furnished by contractors and agents for the use of the Indians. And perhaps the scope of their labors may embrace an inspection of the spoiled flour and tainted meat with which the Indians have been fed at many of the agencies. I have no information as to the manner in which these duties have been performed, nor that the evils of the Indian system have been in any way diminished by their efforts, but it may be hoped that the traffic in the articles I have mentioned will not be quite so flourishing in the future.

Another item of expenditure in addition to those I have enumerated is the sum of $45,000 for printing distributed among one hundred and fifty newspapers. This amount is sufficient to have published the biography of every Indian chief on the plains, and more than enough to have printed spelling-books for every child in all the tribes. For the ten years preceding the transfer of the Indian Bureau to the Department of the Interior, it was conducted at a cost of $17,611,837.98, and in the ten years following that period it was $34,169,799.82, while for the latest period for which I have any estimate, that is from 1870 to 1876, the cost was $44,303,332. It must be borne in mind that all the time of this rapid increase of cost the number of Indians was constantly decreasing, and the expense of their management, it would seem, should have grown less instead of greater. If the cost of Indian affairs continues to be graduated upward in the same ratio as their number continues to decrease, it may be reasonably estimated that by the time they are all destroyed, as is being done under our present system, the whole revenues of the Government will have been swallowed up in the Indian Bureau. After summing up all the items of expense, the Committee on Indian Affairs calculate that $1,000,000 may be saved annually by making the proposed transfer to the War Department, and I see no reason to doubt the correctness of these figures.

Some portion of the present Indian machinery might be necessary under the changed system contemplated by this bill, but the larger, more expensive, and worthless part could be dispensed with, and a greater degree of both economy and efficiency be at the time secured. But after all there is something higher and better to be accomplished than a mere change of agencies. There must be a thorough and radical change in the entire policy of the Government and the prevailing sentiment of our people in respect to the Indian race. Justice and humanity must take the place of cruelty and wrong, the spirit of Christianity and civilization must prompt our actions instead of lawless conquest and unbridled violence. We must discard the monstrous doctrine that the Indians alone, among all the races of mankind, are beyond the reach and influences of civilization, and must therefore be singled out for the terrible doom of extermination. Such a belief and such a purpose is too repugnant to every noble and generous impulse of enlightened Christian men to find a moment's lodgment in any intelligent mind. It is contradicted by history, and must be discarded by reason and experience. Every other nation in the world, except our own, that has had to deal with savage tribes has brought them under the influences and taught them to accept the habits and conditions of civilized life.

Indian tribes, tributary to the British government, live all along the Canadian border, and for fifty years they have made no outbreak, and committed no violence. Mexico has them in large numbers within her territory, and they make no war upon the white race of that country. Even the fierce tribes of our western frontier, who now battle for their homes and country with such savage fury, lived in peace for a hundred years with the few whites among them, and quietly submitted to the mild away and Christian teachings of the Catholic priesthood. Let us see if we cannot do what others have done. Let us try the experiment of dealing fairly and justly with the Indians by observing the obligations of our treaties and respecting a few of their rights, and see the result. Put them in the charge of the Army, not to wage war upon them, but to protect them from the intrusion, the vices, and robberies of white men, and we may at last subdue their savage instincts and have peace upon our borders.

REPEAL OF BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. WILLIS, of Kentucky, addressed the House on the proposed repeal of the bankrupt law. [His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Speaker, it was not until after the House took the recess this evening that I had any idea of occupying even a moment's time on this occasion. But there is an important bill which the Speaker announced would come up to-morrow morning as unfinished business; and I desire to present a few points in relation to that subject by way of explaining my course upon it and to indicate also what I conceive the House ought to do.

The bankrupt act has many defects. It is a very faulty law and in its execution it works great hardships and great injustice in many particulars. One of its objectionable features is the great expensiveness of its administration and the great amount of assets of bankrupts that is consumed in paying costs. But, Mr. Speaker, faulty as the law may be and wise as it may be to repeal it, I submit that the repeal of the voluntary bankruptcy feature ought not to take effect immediately on the passage of the act.

If there ever was an occasion when a bankrupt law was needed in this country—and it is very doubtful whether there ought not to be on the statute-book of the United States a permanent bankrupt law of some modified character—whatever necessity has existed for a bankrupt law, it certainly exists just at this time as greatly as it ever did. Every morning paper I pick up contains columns of notices of bankruptcies and failures on the part of men of business all over this land. The present policy which has been adopted and is being carried out now in opposition to the views of many of us here—the early resumption of specie payments by forced means—is producing widespread ruin from one end of the country to the other.

Now, I submit that this is not exactly the time when we ought to repeal that law; or at least if we repeal it now there ought to be inserted in our act a provision that the repeal shall not take effect until some time hence. If the bill is amended so as to take effect on the 1st of next January, and if other features of the bill do not strike me as wrong, I should probably be willing to support the repealing act. On the 1st of next January specie resumption is to begin according to the present policy. Let us give time, Mr. Speaker, from now till then for the men who will be ruined by hundreds and thousands in that process to find some refuge, even though it be no better refuge than the bankrupt act. This may at least save them from utter beggary.

But the special reason why I speak on this occasion is that in my own State there is a condition of affairs calling upon us to grant some time to men who are in distress before the bankrupt law is utterly destroyed. Ten years ago when the State of North Carolina was reconstructed those who established the new government inserted in the constitution a provision allowing a homestead of a thousand dollars' worth of land and an exemption of five hundred dollars' worth of personal property; and the language of the provision was that it should not be subject to execution for debt. I suppose that most lawyers would agree that this homestead and exemption could only have relation to debts contracted subsequently to the adoption of that constitution. But upon the broad language of the constitutional provision the question was raised whether the homestead provision of the North Carolina constitution was not retroactive, applying as well to debts contracted before as after it. Upon that question a case was taken to the supreme court of North Carolina about ten years ago, the case of Hill vs. Kessler, in which our supreme court decided that the homestead provision was retroactive, so that debts contracted prior to its enactment as well as subsequently were entitled to its benefit. That decision has been reaffirmed in several cases which have since gone to our supreme court involving substantially the same question. The people of North Carolina under this decision have been saved from being utterly crushed by their debts. Recently, however, a case involving this question was brought up by appeal from the supreme court of North Carolina to the Supreme Court of the United States, the case of Edwards vs. Kearsey; and just ten days ago the Supreme Court of the United States reversed the decision of the State court, which had been standing for ten years, and declared that the homestead provision of the constitution of North Carolina could not be construed as retroactive; that to hold it so would be in violation of the Constitution of the United States which declares that "no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts."

Under this decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, all debtors in North Carolina who have been allowed to retain a home for their families upon the homestead secured by State law are at the mercy of their creditors to-day. I need not undertake to depict what wide-spread ruin and distress is likely to fall on that land when all the executions which are now lying in court ready to be issued shall be issued in pursuance of this recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. Men will be sold out by the hundred, by the thousand—utterly ruined, beggared—their wives and children turned into the fields and woods without a home, without a spot upon which to plant their feet and call it theirs, almost without a dollar's worth of property to meet the ordinary necessities of life. For the old exemption law of North Carolina was of such a limited character—so small an amount of goods was exempt from execution of debt, no land whatever being included in the exemption—that when you take away the benefit of this homestead provision, as it is taken away by this recent decision, and remit men owing old debts to the small exemption which the State law previously allowed, the distress must be indeed extensive and demand our sympathies. There may be individuals who have used the homestead law as a shelter for fraud on their creditors; but to the great majority of those who resorted to it it was the sole refuge from real want.

Now I submit that if this decision be followed just at this moment by the repeal of the bankrupt act, and this repeal is made to go into effect immediately, you will greatly aggravate the distress and hardships which will overspread my State. I have not heard from my constituents on the subject, but in the views which I present I am following only my own judgment, guided as I always am by an eye single to the interests and needs of those who sent me here.

The people of North Carolina were ruined by the war. They were very much in debt when the war closed, and very nearly all their property was gone except their lands. They were deprived by the results of the war of the means of paying their debts. The homestead provision was inserted in the constitution as an act of mercy. For whatever reason it was sustained by the supreme court of North Carolina, contrary to the opinion of most good lawyers as to the legal soundness of the decision, it was certainly almost a necessity then that it should be sustained, to prevent intolerable evils to the people.

I am glad the gentleman of the Judiciary Committee, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. McMAHON,] who has the bill in charge, is here to-night. What I desire to suggest to him is that a measure be offered in the nature of a substitute for the Senate bill, and that the substitute shall contain a provision postponing the time for the repeal to take effect to the 1st day of January next.

Mr. McMAHON. If the gentleman will allow me, I will read the third section of the bill which I have been instructed to offer:

This bill shall take effect from its passage as to all involuntary proceedings except as provided in the preceding section, and as to voluntary applications from and after the 1st day of January, 1879.

Mr. ROBBINS. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to know that the Judiciary Committee propose to do exactly what I wish done, and if that amendment is proposed to the bill and this House agrees to it, I believe as a compromise I shall feel warranted in giving my vote for the bill. But I am very frank to say that unless that is done I shall be entirely unable to record my vote in its favor. I concede much that has been said just now by the eloquent young gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] against the bankrupt law and in favor of its repeal. While I do that, I ask that this House adopt the suggestion of the Judiciary Committee and allow the people to have the benefit of the bankrupt law until resumption of specie payments has finished its ruin. Then we can fall back upon what ought possibly to be the normal law of the country and dispense with the bankrupt law. As to involuntary bankruptcies, I am perfectly willing that the repeal of that provision shall take effect from date. It is, as to the other, the voluntary feature of the law that I desire the postponement.

I am very much obliged to the House for the attention it has given me in these brief and unstudied remarks. All I desired to do was to express my sentiments on the subject because I supposed there would be no opportunity to do so to-morrow morning when the bill comes up for action. By way of explaining my own intended votes and for the purpose of influencing as far as I could the votes of other gentlemen in favor of delaying the day for the repeal to take effect, I have submitted these remarks to-night. To take the benefit of the bankrupt law is but a dreary refuge and a dernier ressort, it is true; but let us agree to leave it at least a little while longer to those who may find it necessary to fly to it as the only shield against actual beggary for themselves and their families. Extend mercy to the impoverished and unfortunate.

TARIFF AND ITS RELATION TO AGRICULTURE.

Mr. MULBROW. Mr. Speaker, I am liberal in my impulses toward every industry in this country. I believe that all should be encouraged, and that none should attempt to impede the progress and prosperity of the one by invidious discrimination in favor of another, but that the arm of each should be strengthened in proportion to the benefits to be derived for the prosperity of the country and happiness of the people.

Representing an agricultural district, and sincerely believing that of all the industries of the country it is the most deserving of the fostering care of the Government, in considering the pending measure I desire to make an appeal for it. In discussing the tariff bill now pending I desire to enlarge upon the interests of this industry, the greatest of all in this country, and show some of its general needs so far as Federal legislation is concerned.

The tariff bill now before Congress, in my judgment, while in many respects it is better than the present law, and I may vote for some of its provisions if no better are offered, is not what it should be, and before it reaches any degree of excellence must be shorn of many of its imperfections.

It does not conform, as a whole, in its average percentage of customs duties which prevailed under the Walker tariff of 23½ per cent. when the country was most prosperous, but is very far in excess of it. I could but notice the striking contrast and want of harmony between the admissions, statements, and arguments of the distinguished gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] who reported the bill, and the bill itself in reference to this. He admitted that the laws on the tariff, the creation of the last fifteen years, embracing the startling number of one hundred and eight in all, were for the creation of some special domestic interest or to subserve some partisan purpose, and yet the percentage, as a whole, of the bill reported by him is insignificantly smaller than that of the present law, which he decried so much, and which he declared to be so outrageous that it is difficult to speak of it with patience, and of the provisions of which he said—

They are immoral in theory, utterly indefensible in practice, and without any merits upon which their most ingenious and well-paid beneficiaries can maintain their defense.

Listening to the declaration of his ideas, theories, arguments, and statements of facts, one would have supposed that he never could conscientiously have reported such a bill, still bearing down with such cruel force upon the masses of the people and the principal industries in which they are engaged as that brought in by his committee and now urged upon the House.

Mr. NEAL. Does the gentleman from Mississippi hold that the consumer pays the taxes imposed by the tariff?

Mr. MULBROW. I do hold that the consumer pays every tax imposed under the tariff system.

In presenting the following forceful picture, we are disappointed that the hand that could draw and the eye that could scan it, when he took the brush of the master to apply it to the correction of its defects, should fail in so many signal particulars. He says:

The farmer, whose whole mind is bent on his agricultural pursuits, has neither the time nor opportunity to investigate the influence of the tariff tax on his household expenses; it is a fact, however, that every article he uses is either directly subject to a tariff tax or enhanced by the tariff. Let us enumerate these burdens: the farmer's house in the West, where lumber is scarce, pays either a direct or enhanced tax of 20 per cent. on the lumber his house is built of; a tax of 35 per cent. on the paint it is painted with; of 90 per cent. on his window-glass; of 35 per cent. on the nails; of 53 per cent. on the screws; of 30 per cent. on the door-locks; of from 35 to 40 per cent. on the hinges; of 35 per cent. on the wall-paper; of from 60 to 70 per cent. on his carpet; of 40 per cent. on his crockery; of 35 per cent. on his iron hollow-ware; of 35 per cent. on his cutlery; 40 per cent. on his glassware; of from 35 per cent. to 40 per cent. on the linen he uses in the household; of 51 per cent. on the common castile soap he uses; 48 per cent. on the starch. When he goes into his stable, barn, or workshop he will find that he pays 35 per cent. on the iron he uses; 53 per cent. on the halter-chains; 45 per cent. on the files and rasps he may use; 47 per cent. on the backsaw; 49 per cent. on the cross-cut saw; 38 per cent. on the handsaw, and 35 per cent. on any sheet-iron he may require. On his medicines he pays 20 per cent.; on the quinine pills he swallows, 20 per cent.; on blue-pills 20 per cent., and 40 per cent. on any medicinal preparations. The female-portion of his house cannot even go into hysteria without paying a tax of 20 per cent. on asafetida that may be required to quiet their excited nerves. On his sugar he pays a tax of at least 60 per cent. As for the clothing he and his family uses, let me enumerate the tax separately: on his wool hat he pays from 60 to 80 per cent.; on his fur hat, from 45 to 60 per cent.; on his suit of woolen clothes, some 55 per cent.; on the leather for his boots and shoes, 25 per cent.; on his hosiery, 35 per cent.; on his wife's and daughter's common alpaca dress he pays 65 to 70 per cent.; on spool-thread, 70 per cent., and on the needles, 35 per cent. If I were inclined to pursue these topics further it would take up too much time; suffice it to say that the furnishing of his child's cradle and the coffin in which he is finally buried pay a direct tax or are enhanced in price by our tariff system.

The ruinous rates of taxation here presented are enough to startle the nation, and the wonder is that it has been so long endured by a patient and suffering people, and still greater the wonder that he who has presented it so forcibly has not applied the pruning-knife with a more liberal hand to correct the evil. While he shows the enormous tax of 20 per cent. on the lumber in the farmer's house under the present law, his bill still requires him to pay, by his own showing, 15 per cent.; while under the present law he must pay on his nails 35 per cent., under the proposed he must still pay 32 per cent., and about the same on his screws, hinges, and door-locks; while under the present law he must pay 40 per cent. on his crockery, he under the proposed must pay 38 per cent.; while under the present he pays 35 per cent. on his cutlery, under the proposed he must pay 32 per cent.; while under the present he pays from 35 to 40 per cent. on his linen, under the proposed he will still pay from 30 to 35 per cent.; while on the iron he uses in his shop under the present he pays 53 per cent., under the proposed he will pay 32 per cent., and in the same proportion upon every article of which iron is a component part; while on his sugar under the present he pays a tax of 60 per cent., under the proposed it cannot be less than the enormous sum of 80 or 90 per cent.; while under the present he must pay on his wool hat from 60 to 80 per cent., under the proposed he will pay from 50 to 70 per cent.; while under the present he pays on his fur hat from 45 to 60 per cent., under the proposed he must still pay almost in the same proportion; while under the present he pays 55 per cent. on his woolen clothes, under the proposed he must still pay 43 per cent.; on leather, 25 per cent. under the present and 20 per cent. under the proposed law, and so on to the end.

In some cases, for instance those of sugar, molasses, and sirups, there is an increase of the tax, and where reduction is made in the main it is so trifling as to afford but little relief. It is true that on cotton goods the reduction from nearly 54 to 25 per cent. is considerable, and if the remainder of the bill conformed to this standard it would be a vast improvement on the existing law, and for the present might meet with general acceptance and would approach what the people demand, tariff legislation for the purpose of revenue and not for the purpose of the protection and aggrandizement of the few at the expense of the many.

Under existing tariff legislation so onerous and blighting to all other industries than manufactures the average percentage on dutiable goods is less than 50 per cent., and under that which is proposed by the gentleman from New York it will still be nearly 40 per cent. Can any practical man see much relief in this?

The principle of protection is wrong. This Government has no moral right to tax the people of Illinois and Mississippi for the benefit of those of Georgia and Massachusetts. It has no moral right to tax the cotton-planters of Alabama and Texas for the benefit of the rice-producers of Carolina and the sugar-planters of Louisiana.

In the earlier history of the country it might have been more pardonable than now to give monopoly by the General Government to manufactures, because in case of war without manufactures the people would be unable to obtain comfortable clothing. But like other unjust and harsh rules the necessities of war should be tolerated only so long as demanded by the exigencies which give rise to their adoption. Indeed most of the arguments in favor of this theory were bottomed upon the idea of the necessity of preparing for war in time of peace and making ourselves in the event of war independent of foreign powers.

Should the different States desire the erection of manufactories upon their own domain, let them by proper State legislation furnish such aid and assistance as may be compatible with the general welfare. I would be glad to see this country, North and South, dotted over with manufactories, and thus adding year by year to the common wealth of the people; but I protest against this sweeping and consuming taxation which an oppressed people have been forced to bear until ruin and devastation have marked the fairest fields and the happiest homes.

For nearly a hundred years manufactories have had the fostering care of the Government. It has stood watch over them by night and by day. It has been their faithful sentinel from infancy to mature manhood, watching first their tottering steps of infancy and afterward their proud strides of matured manhood. It has upheld and supported them until now they stand the peers of the proudest manufacturing establishments of the world, exporting annually large quantities of their goods rivaling in artistic beauty and intrinsic value the best fabrics of the eastern hemisphere. This is surely enough for the General Government to do for them, and they can now stand alone and fight the battle of competition, relying upon their own excellence and strength furnished to them by their foster-mother.

Mr. Speaker, the condition of affairs in our country is anything but promising. The conflict between the producers who support and the monopolists who have used this Government for their own aggrandizement is not yet ended. Each party is but resting to recruit his forces for another conflict. The passage of the silver bill in the shape in which it became a law has not given satisfaction to the people, and the battle must go on until there is a disposition shown by those who have not made, and yet have reaped the benefit of, the annual harvest of the husbandman, to legislate for the benefit of those whose earnings and toil make up the wealth of the Republic and furnish the revenues of the National Treasury. There is scarcely a lull in the storm; and the dark surroundings must awaken a solicitude as widespread as the continent and as all-pervading as the light that breaks with the opening of the day.

And in this connection the question occurs, What are the primary causes of this conflict; what the reasons for distress in the land? That there are many, it must be confessed; far too many to be dwelt upon in a single speech; but one of the greatest, in my judgment, is the legislation of the past several years against our agricultural industries. If there had been a settled determination on the part of capitalists through mercenary selfishness to prostrate and destroy this overshadowing interest, they could scarcely have succeeded better than to have adopted the policy which has been sanctioned by Congress and molded into law. That they are responsible for it can scarcely be questioned. At every session, armed with the powers of bonds, banks, and manufactories, they are seen moving through the corridors of the Capitol to control legislation. Mocking at the calamities of the people, they have turned aside almost every shield sought to be lifted up for their protection. Instead of its being a Government by the people and for the people, to insure domestic tranquility, and under which life, liberty, and property are made secure, with the seal of perpetuity impressed, as was intended when its rising glory was announced a century ago, it has become in many instances one of exactions, usury, and penalties.

For a decade and more it has been conducted in the interest of the few and in violation of the rights of the many. And not satisfied yet, but encouraged by success in the past, the mercenary favorites are ever here, both by representative and in proper person, to see what still can be utilized to themselves, from the results of the toils of the husbandman, and very often obtrude themselves upon committees whose time should be employed in devising ways and means to relieve the distress of a prostrate country and a suffering people.

But no one ever hears of the farmer in the lobbies of the Capitol. Petitions but seldom come from him. A distinguished man has pertinently said:

Delegations crowd the official chambers of the Government in behalf of every human enterprise except that which is greatest of all, the cause of labor.

To supply the coffers of capitalists, Congress has robbed the agricultural interests of this country of well-nigh all that it has been in its power to despoil them of. It could not take from them the science which is independent of legislation, independent of human agency since first evoked for the benefit of mankind, and which enters necessarily every department of industry, penetrates the bowels of the earth, enters the workshops, analyzes the soil, speeds along with the iron coursers of the rail, tramples upon the billows, and defies the tempest; but wherever it could strike a blow to cripple and blight the agricultural interests of the country it has fallen with relentless power. It has laid the mailed hand of the tariff upon it. It has taxed it both directly and indirectly. It has by its legislation aided and encouraged nearly all other industries, while it has paralyzed and prostrated this. It has bloated bondholders and piled up idle money in their vaults, to be put in circulation again only on gilded security. It has destroyed the value of their lands, and caused them to be sacrificed in many cases under the hammer of marshals and sheriffs, and they ejected from their homes and the homes of their fathers in old age, and in penury sent adrift upon the heartless charities of the world. This and more have been enforced by the action of the Federal Congress.

The people have been made to yield to the exactions of the monopolists till patience has ceased to be a virtue, and crippled, care-worn, and sore though they are, they intend to have it understood that they are tired crouching between privileged masters, and demand that their interests must and shall be respected, and the cruel fingers of legislation taken from their throats. They are rapidly learning their strength. The progressive education they are receiving in all parts of the country is rapidly developing in them the laudable ambition to have their power recognized, and the place of advantage they hold in the prosperity of this country appreciated by every department of the Government. They know full well that when they desire it they can utilize an awakened power which has so long slumbered, and mold and shape legislation to conform to their interests. The hammer of Odin is in their hands, and with it, when they see fit to use it, they can repeat the stroke of Teutonic mythology, and shake from center to circumference the political fabric of this Government. It may be said that they are becoming impatient, and not without cause, so far as Federal legislation is concerned. Although there is no interest so deeply concerned in legislation, State and national, and none that so much deserves the careful study of legislators and statesmen and the fostering care of those whose duty it is to make and execute the laws, yet it has received less encouragement, less aid, and less protection in this country than in almost any other civilized country upon the habitable globe. Nearly all the countries of Europe are in advance of us in their appreciation of this interest. England, France, Belgium, Austria, and Germany have for many years applied themselves to its encouragement. There is indeed scarcely a country in continental Europe where the important interest of agriculture is not sheltered and encouraged by state patronage, and they have shown more disposition to regulate public affairs in accordance with the wishes of the people and in conformity with the real interest of the State than has agricultural America. Even monarchical Prussia, looking to the interests of commerce and the general prosperity of her realms, is in advance of us in protection to this industry, while France has annually expended very large sums of money to promote the science and give it encouragement, and Belgium is doing a work of incalculable benefit to her farmers in making a monthly publication of the agricultural statistics, giving information to the producers of the state of the crops, so at the time of harvest they can have the data upon which they can reckon their value and not be entirely at the mercy of brokers' reports and commercial corners.

The advancement and growth of every country is marked by the advancement of agriculture. It settles new states and gives employment to unemployed labor all over the land; it constitutes the basis of foreign and domestic commerce by furnishing the products of the soil to supply the demand both at home and abroad. It employs the tonnage of ship-builders and creates the necessity which demands the construction of railways, levees, and canals. All other industries are but its handmaids. Manufactories and commerce are fed upon its bounties. It furnishes food to the laborer who puts the wheel of the engine in motion; it supplies the fiber for the spindle, and it furnishes the life-blood of every human enterprise. It is difficult to magnify its importance upon the commerce of the world. The cotton trade alone seems to have been sufficient to revolutionize it. Wherever a bale of cotton goes, it is a symbol of the intelligence, industry, and power of our country. It has been said that the abolition of the corn laws of England, opening the ports of Great Britain to American breadstuffs and provisions, was a triumph achieved by American cotton-growers over the feudal aristocracy of the Old World. It has furnished bread to the laboring masses of Great Britain and Ireland, at the same time that it clothed them, and formed the first step toward the amelioration of their condition. Who, then, can fail to understand its importance?

It is admitted by all that this country is grievously oppressed with debt. Federal, State, municipal, corporation, and private indebtedness is estimated at one-half of the entire property of the country. The interest of this great debt, and eventually the debt itself, must be paid from the agricultural resources of the country. At no time in our history was it more important to foster this interest than now. We want a balance of trade with foreign countries. We want our shipment of cotton and breadstuffs and other products of the farm to Liverpool, Bremen, and Havre to more than balance the articles of merchandise which we must import; and this very desirable thing, if our country is prosperous, must be superinduced by the products of the field which leave our shores for foreign ports for sale or exchange. We should have international commerce and a foreign as well as a home market for every product of the soil; a commerce that will send our cotton, corn, and wheat to Europe, as well as to Lowell and New York, and transport to our shores in return the fabrics of the English looms and the wine of French vineyards; a commerce that will send to South America other needful products of our soil and bring back to us in return the raw hides of Buenos Ayres and Montevideo. Adam Smith has said that "a home trade is the best trade for agriculture," but we want both, and proper legislation and proper appliances in making treaties with foreign powers will give us both.

In order to create this balance in our favor it is necessary to protect, foster, and encourage this great industry. For this and other purposes during the present session I introduced a bill to make the Department of Agriculture, already created, an Executive department of the Government, with a commissioner at its head, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and when so appointed to be recognized as a Cabinet officer. For the protection of the agricultural interests and to promote the general prosperity I believe that this Department should have a voice in that branch of the Government which exercises supervisory power to the extent of the veto over the legislation of Congress, and which with the concurrence of the Senate has the power to make treaties with foreign powers. When the question of establishing a separate department for agriculture was before Congress in 1862, it was admitted by even the enemies of the bill that there was no interest in this country comparable with it. A distinguished Senator at that time who opposed that measure said in a speech upon the floor of the Senate Chamber:

All agree that agriculture is the basis of our national prosperity; that it is a paramount interest.

It is singular that, with these admissions upon the part even of those who seem to have no disposition to foster and encourage it, it has received so little in the way of Federal legislation. For more than fifteen years petition after petition from honest farmers was sent to Congress asking for a recognition of their rights by the establishment of this department, and it is a shame that, when Congress was impressed with the importance of this great interest sufficiently to establish a separate department for its encouragement, it dealt out with a niggardly hand the small pittance of importance it was to receive. As if jealous of the rights of this great body of American freemen, although every other separate department was recognized in executive councils, this seemed to be purposely excluded.

When Mr. Thompson was Secretary of the Interior he manifested his appreciation of its importance to the country by appointing a special superintendent of agriculture; and this was the first distinctive recognition of it by any of the Departments at Washington. Himself largely interested as a southern planter, he appreciated the struggle that had been made for years by the farmers to obtain the recognition by the General Government of their important business—a business which annually yields more than $4,000,000,000 and a pursuit in which nearly one-half of our entire population are engaged and directly interested.

When the question of a Department of Agriculture was before Congress in 1862 it was charged by the opponents of the measure that ultimately an effort would be made to elevate it into an executive department, with representation in the Cabinet of the President; and so little was the great proportion of this industry recognized, so little was the power of this class appreciated, that the timid advocates of the then pending bill were afraid to claim that if such demand should ever be made it was right and that it was an interest sufficiently important and powerful to justify such recognition.

The opponents of the bill attempted to defeat its passage altogether by the subtle and adroit representation that the farmers of the country wanted no such recognition as the establishment even of a separate Department for the protection of their interests; that all they wanted of the American Congress was to be let alone; that the interests of the agriculturists would not be promoted by the movement; that that policy is best for the farmer which does the least for and interferes the least with him. This statement of the case, cunning and adroit as it is, does not deceive the intelligent men of the country connected with agriculture; for, while the cry may be, "Let the farmer alone!" they know too well that the farmer has never yet been let alone, from the time the Government was formed to the present.

It is said that Mr. Webster, in the latter days of his life, attempted to extricate the question of manufactories and the tariff as related to manufactories from the political arena, and that he strenuously and perseveringly devoted himself to that end. It is too well known how little was his success in that direction to need affirmation. Almost every Congress from the formation of the Government down to this has had before it some scheme for a protective tariff for the benefit of manufactories, and every scheme ever yet devised has been in direct antagonism to the interest of the land-holders and agriculturists of the country. Legislation has at all times in the history of our country been for the protection and encouragement of commerce and manufactories to the exclusion of agriculture. By the consolidation of the power of their wealth, they have been enabled to command to the fullest extent the attention of the Government, to the great detriment of this interest, and this, too, while the census shows that it is not only the largest interest of the country, but involves more than every other branch of industry combined.

Professor Johnston in his lecture on agricultural chemistry says that "nine-tenths of the fixed capital of all civilized nations is embarked in agriculture." Even in the State of New York, which contains the great commercial metropolis of the continent, with its enormous wealth, the agricultural interest pays four-fifths of the taxes. Of the population of this country about 46.30 per cent., or nearly one-half, are immediately engaged in this industry, while in England only 15½ per cent., or less than one-sixth, are so engaged. And just here I desire to incorporate some statistics in order that this Congress may act advisedly, not only on the pending question before us but also upon all others which may hereafter arise affecting the interests of this class of our people. The industry of our country, as shown by the census of 1870, is divided in the main between four great classes of occupations. By that census the population of the United States over ten years of age was 28,222,945; those engaged in all classes of occupation, 12,505,923, of which number 10,669,635 were males and 1,836,288 females. They were distributed as follows:

Engaged in agriculture	5,922,471
Engaged in manufactures and mechanical and mining industries	2,707,421
Engaged in professional and personal services	2,684,793
Engaged in trade and transportation	1,191,238

Total

Those engaged in agriculture were divided as follows:

Agricultural laborers	2,885,996
Artists	136
Dairy men and women	3,550
Farm and plantation overseers	3,609
Farmers and planters	2,977,711
Florists	1,065
Gardeners and nurserymen	31,435
Stock-drovers	3,161
Stock-herders	5,390
Stock-raisers	6,568
Turpentine farmers	361
Turpentine laborers	2,117
Vine-growers	1,112

Total

This exhibits that, as before asserted, nearly one-half of our people are engaged in agriculture, while in England and Wales, which are doing more for this interest than we are, less than one-sixth are so employed.

In England and Wales at the last census (in 1871) out of 22,712,266 persons, aged twenty and upward, there was the following distribution of the occupation of the people:

Professional classes under the government	242,777
Other professions	441,325
Commercial classes	528,260
Agricultural classes	1,656,934
Domestic classes	1,633,514
Industrial classes in manufactures, &c.	6,140,202
Persons of independent means	168,985

Total

These figures present the most striking and faithful picture which can be drawn to exhibit the grand proportions of this industry in our country and portray the prominent character it plays and the important bearing it has and is destined to have upon the commerce of the world. They are dull and dry ordinarily, but when compared with those of any other industry or interest they speak with an eloquence and a power greater than any language can express.

Again, take the figures in exports from the United States in 1866 and 1867, from the official report of the Bureau of Statistics to August 23, 1877:

There were, then, during the years 1866 and 1867, ending June 30, of the product of the farm, shipped in the state in which it left the farmers' hands, more than two-thirds of the entire exports of every character, and from every source of the country, and this estimate does not include the manufactured cotton goods, amounting in value to the sum of $7,722,978 for the year 1876 and $10,235,843 for the year 1877, the product of our own looms, supplied exclusively by American cotton, and which should be added to the grand aggregate after deducting the cost of manufacturing. Of the 54,162,888 hundred-weight of wheat imported by the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in 1877 40 per cent. was imported from the United States and of the 1,356,635,728 pounds of raw cotton nearly 68 per cent. was taken from us.

Again, to show its importance, take the principal field crops for the past three years.

But this does not include the products of the garden, the dairy, and the orchard, which aggregate millions more, to say nothing of the hundreds of millions that are yearly added to the wealth of the country, by the raising of horses, cattle, hogs, poultry, grasses, and other products of the farm, making a grand aggregate of about four billions annually.

There has been no difficulty at all in procuring the acknowledgment upon the part of politicians and statesmen of the paramount importance and interest of this industry, but the difficulty has been to have accorded to it substantial acts of justice.

Mr. Webster, in his agricultural address at Boston upon his return from England, said:

No man in England is so high as to be independent of this great interest, no man so low as not to be affected by its prosperity or decline.

The same is true, emphatically true with us; agriculture feeds, to a great extent it clothes us; without it we would not have manufactures, we would not have commerce; they all stand together like pillars in a cluster, largest in the center, and that largest agriculture.

The able committee who reported the bill for the establishment of a department said:

It is conceded upon all sides that the farming interest is the basis of all other interests and the primary source of national prosperity. The outline of the rise and decay of the Roman Empire could have been written in the fields which surrounded the capital as well as in her libraries and historical records. The cultivation of the earth was the first duty assigned to man, and it will of necessity be his latest work. When its culture shall have reached its highest point of perfection under the guidance of science, art, and skill, man may hope to find the whole earth transformed into the beautiful garden that he left in the olden time.

Alexander Hyde, who has contributed so much to the cause of agricultural literature and knowledge, said of it:

The adaptation of agriculture to all ranks and conditions of society is not less wonderful. The king himself without any loss of dignity can be a farmer, most of the Presidents of the United States have retired from their high positions to the cultivation of their broad acres. * * * Of Washington as a farmer, we are almost as proud as of Washington the President. Adams on his farm at Quincy, Jefferson at Monticello, Jackson at the Hermitage, were just as dignified as when in the presidential chair. Van Buren prided himself as much upon his large patch of cabbage as upon his sharp diplomacy at Washington. Clay surrounded by his short-horns at Ashland, as when gazed upon with delight by his peers in the Senate Chamber. The massive intellect of Webster was as conspicuous in the guidance of his farm at Marshfield as when he guided the affairs of state.

Prince and peasant alike feel that in cultivating the soil they are fulfilling the mission which the Creator gave to man when he placed him in the Garden of Eden.

Stephen A. Douglas said of it:

Agriculture in this country is highly respectable, and at the same time a most attractive pursuit. It is not only resorted to as a means of acquiring an honest independence, but as a dignified and pleasurable occupation it is sought by men of science and letters, by statesmen and warriors, merchants and navigators; in short, by all who have gathered wealth, honor, and distinction in other pursuits of life.

You may recall with pride that illustrious race of cultivators who, from Cincinnati to Washington, graced and ennobled agriculture, and which in turn graced and ennobled them.

Agriculture stimulates every species of industry; it is the parent and supporter of them all. What, I would ask, would be the present condition of our foreign commerce had it not been stimulated by the increased productions of agriculture, what the condition of our mercantile navy, in steamers and sailing ships outstripping that of the first nation of the globe? It is the bulky products of agriculture that make up freights and furnish the principal portion of our foreign exchange.

The allusion of Mr. Douglas to a mercantile navy in steamers and sailing-ships was when the legislation of Congress was more friendly to this industry than it has been for a past decade and more. It was when ships with a tonnage of over five millions lay ready in the ports of our country to bear the products of the labor of the people to all parts of the earth and bring back in exchange the necessities and luxuries which soil, climate, and the habits or necessities of other regions enabled them to produce for us more cheaply than we could for ourselves; ships that have been driven from the seas by our system of tariff taxation for the benefit only of manufacturers. It was at a time when our Republic was gradually pushing to the front among the foremost nations of the earth; when the white sails of our vessels were to be seen on every sea and our flag was floating in every port, the symbol of our rising grandeur; with a marine that was scarcely inferior to that of Great Britain, and manned by sailors and seamen whose prowess and dauntless courage was recognized with admiration by every people in every country, and with a place in their estimation of foemen worthy the steel of the gallant tars of a Van Tromp, a Nelson, or a Decatur.

The farming class justly complain that, while there has been no stint of words of adulation for them and their avocation, yet they are practically ignored. They now want substance, not shadow.

It is a singular fact that it has received so little recognition from the Government that it was not until 1840 that it was even noticed and included in the Federal schedule. Since the organization of the Government only $3,216,114.37 have been appropriated for its promotion. As to its neglect in comparison with other Departments, the following table tells its own tale:

Expenditures for 1877 and 1878.

Departments, &c.	1877.	1878.
Department of State.....	$1,188,797 50	$1,147,660 48

Yet our farmers have submitted to all of these discriminations against them almost without a murmur. This unobtrusive class of our population, with always power enough to dictate their own terms in the organization of the different departments of the Government as well as the legislation of Congress if they had been disposed to exercise it, either from inertia, indifference, or an overweening confidence in the rest of mankind, have until of very late years permitted their great avocation to be practically ignored in the administration of Federal power. But I repeat that the time is now rapidly coming when it can be no longer ignored. The population along the great Mississippi Valley and its tributaries, embracing a territory of over two-fifths of the national domain, to say nothing of the other great agricultural regions, are rapidly becoming educated to understand their interests and to insist upon their rights. They are learning to properly regard their calling, not as an art merely, in which the few are concerned, but a great avocation, worthy of the study of the best minds of the country, and that it is a substantial, powerful industry, deserving the fostering care of the Government which it supports and upholds. The farmers of Kansas and Illinois and Ohio and other great agricultural regions are moving with determination in the matter, and they have through their organized societies passed formal resolutions approving of the objects of the bill which I have introduced making the Department of Agriculture an Executive Department of the Government, and have earnestly requested their members of Congress, irrespective of party, to give their influence to and cast their votes in favor of the measure.

The greater the number of our people that can be turned into this channel of industry the more will our prosperity be apparent; but it is a painful and startling fact that the proportion of our population engaged in agriculture is becoming smaller year by year. The census of 1820 exhibited the fact that of our population for both sexes 83 per cent. were engaged in agriculture, while the census of 1840 shows only 77 per cent., in 1850 only 50 per cent., and in 1870 only 46.31 per cent. If therefore behooves those interested in this industry to arouse themselves to the necessities of the hour, and strike for the protection of their interests while they yet have the power. Every man who ceases to be a practical tiller of the soil, to that extent, by the axiomatic laws of political economy lessens the substantial wealth of the Republic. Ceasing to produce he yet consumes, and every ounce of food taken to sustain his life is so much extracted from the common wealth of the people. And not only those immediately interested, but every one who wishes to see "life in the old land yet," who desires her importance increased and her commerce extended, should engage in the task of encouraging this industry.

The influence of American agriculture upon the commerce of the world ought to be immense and it ought to be extended year by year as its importance increases. Reciprocity treaties should be made with foreign countries, opening a market for their surplus productions. Restrictions, where they exist, should be removed and facilities afforded for seeking the best markets of the world in which to sell our surplus productions. In order to accomplish these desirable ends, a mind devoted to this subject at home and abroad, made comprehensive by study and research upon the great questions connected with this interest, and which will have the responsibility of its fostering care, should be in a position where it might be accomplished as far as human agency could effect it; a man who would be thoroughly posted as to the amount of subsistence in the country and its true value, tested by the laws of demand and supply, through a system of statistics which should be organized under his direction; one who could advise exportation and importation as the ability or wants of the country might demand, to prevent suffering on the one hand or extortion on the other; an officer who could advise the planters upon reliable data of the probable value of their crops and save to them millions which go into the hands of speculators annually in consequence of their want of information as to the value of their property; one who could be present in person when the subject of treaties is being discussed, and to see how they affect this great interest. It is difficult to magnify the importance of the treaty-making power as affecting agricultural industry. The diplomatic and consular systems seem to have been organized to regard only the interest of commerce and manufactures; but they could be made equally subservient to that of agriculture and its co-ordinate branches. The same reports which are required in reference to commerce and manufactures should also be required in regard to the different agricultural productions and the improvements which from time to time may be introduced in their culture, and such other general information as would tend to promote and encourage them. Not only this, but a great variety of legislative enactments need constantly the guiding hand and frequently the counsel of one whose mind is trained in these channels of interest, whose business it is to know all that concerns their prosperity, and whose duties require that he shall study and learn and watch all legislation that imperils them.

And at no period in the history of our country, I repeat, does this seem to be of more importance than now. Under the discriminations of Congress against it a general pervading gloom has been spread over the face of the country. In all that region which stretches itself from the shores of the Potomac to the Gulf of Mexico and across the Mississippi, where all the arts of civilized life once triumphed, the arm of industry is now paralyzed; large and ample estates, once the seats of opulence, which supported their proprietors in affluence and comfort, are now thrown out to waste and decay. And I am told that the effect is scarcely less perceptible in the great Northwest. Everywhere they are deplorable in the extreme. Property of all kinds is depreciated beyond example; a gloomy despondency beginning to prevail everywhere; estates are sacrificed to pay the last installment on obligations given for the purchase money; nobody will buy because there is no protection for the lauded proprietor. Who can look upon this horrible state of things, in a country upon which God has lavished the most splendid gifts of nature, without concluding that there are defects somewhere in the governmental machinery which prevent its people from being prosperous? What is it that withers and blasts these choicest bounties of nature except the miserable legislation enacted with a total disregard of the intelligence of these bounties? Who can believe that this disregard would have been so long persevered in had there been in the executive department of the Government, clothed with the power of the veto, and upon which, with the approbation of the Senate, is bestowed the power to make treaties with foreign countries, a wise man to invoke the aid of these powers when the interest of agriculture was imperiled? The legislation—at least much of it—which has infringed upon these interests I believe would have been spared had there been such a man in the Cabinet of the President whose duty it was to point out its danger and appeal for its safety. Who believes that the present tariff law, which trenches so harshly against the farmers of the country, would ever have been enacted, or, if enacted, would have been so long allowed to remain to spend its cruel force against them?

The tariff! this extortionate foe of agricultural industry, nurtured by the Government in the interest of manufactures, has pursued it with greedy and cruel exactions. The enormities of it have been very properly criticised by Sidney Smith, in language published many years ago, and the caustic criticism then made by him could be truthfully intensified if he had written after the existence of the present law. Says he:

We can inform Jonathan what are the inevitable consequences of being too fond of glory. Taxes upon every article which enters into the mouth, or covers the back, or is placed under the foot; taxes upon everything which is pleasant to see, hear, feel, smell, or taste; taxes upon warmth, light, and locomotion; taxes in everything on earth, or everything that comes from abroad or is grown at home; taxes upon the raw material; taxes on every fresh value that is added to it by the industry of man; taxes on the sauce which pampers man's appetite and the drug that restores him to health, on the ermine which decorates the judge and the rope which hangs the criminal, on the poor man's salt and the rich man's spice, on the brass nails of the coffin and the ribbons of the bride; at bed or board, couchant or levant, we must pay. The school-boy whips his taxed top, the headless youth manages his taxed horse, with a taxed bridle, on a taxed road, and the dying Englishman, pouring his medicine, which has paid 7 per cent., into a spoon which has paid 15 per cent., flings himself back upon his chintz bed, which has paid 22 per cent., and expires in the arms of an apothecary who has paid a license of a hundred pounds for the privilege of putting him to death. His whole property is then immediately taxed from 2 to 10 per cent.; besides the probate large fees are demanded for burying him in the chancel; his virtues are handed down to posterity on taxed marble, and he is then gathered to his fathers to be taxed no more.

In this country under the name of tariff more than two thousand articles, the most of which either directly or indirectly are used by the farmer, are now subjected to this crucible; and a ceaseless stream is flowing from the veins of the husbandman, from wounds inflicted by the stealthy stiletto of the tariff.

A thrust at the system has been made with a keen and polished rapier in the hands of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Cox.] He says:

The farmer starting from his work has a shoe put on his horse with nails taxed 67 per cent., driven with a hammer taxed 54 per cent., cut a stick with a knife taxed 50 per cent., hitches his horse to a plow taxed 50 per cent., with chains taxed 67 per cent. He returns to his home at night and lays his wearied limbs on a sheet taxed 50 per cent., and covers himself with a blanket that has paid a tax of 250 per cent. He rises in the morning, puts on his humble flannel shirt taxed 80 per cent., his coat taxed 50 per cent., shoes taxed 35 per cent., and hat taxed 70 per cent., opens family worship with a Bible taxed 35 per cent., and kneels to his God on a carpet taxed 250 per cent., sits down to his humble meal from a plate taxed 40 per cent., with a knife and fork taxed 35 per cent., drinks his cup of coffee with sugar taxed 70 per cent., seasons his food with salt taxed 130 per cent., pepper, 297 per cent., and spice, 397 per cent.; he looks around on his wife and children all taxed in the same way, takes a chew of tobacco taxed 100 per cent., and leans back in his chair and thanks his stars that he lives in the freest and best government under heaven.

More than two hundred millions annually are collected from the people by the tariff. Its iron fingers are on the throat of every man in the land, but upon none does it close them with such inexorable and merciless grasp as upon the tiller of the soil. Pretending to be for the purpose of revenue, tariff laws are for the protection of favored monopolists. They are deceptive in their title, fraudulent in their pretexts, oppressive in their exactions, partial and unjust in their operations, and ruinous alike to commerce and agriculture.

The progress of the tariff legislation in this country presents a study of great interest, and it is one of very deep concern to our entire people. So subtle has been its movements, so deceptive its demands, so artful its pretexts, so covert its attacks on other industries than manufactures, that but few of the people of the land have been aware of its stealthy tread, secret approaches, and its silent pressure and relentless grasp upon them.

In 1833 the rate on goods paying duties was 31 per cent., and this rate continued until modified by what was known as the Walker tariff in 1846, which continued in force until 1857, and under it the duty on imported goods was 23½ per cent., when it was again reduced to 19 per cent. In 1862, under the Morrill tariff, it rose to over 33 per cent., and in 1866 to 47 per cent. on dutiable imports. Since which time it has remained with but little modification or change, and its crushing power has been exercised and has been continued to grind agricultural industry into powder. But, say the protectionists, protection gives us a home market, and therefore a high tariff benefits the farmer. The fallacy of this idea is aptly and tersely stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] in a speech delivered upon this subject in the last Congress. Says he:

The home market is another cheat and catchword of the protectionists. After protection unequalled for half a generation the home market has not come to us, but is as far as ever removed from the fields of agriculture; our surplus grain has outgrown the wondrous growth of our population, and it has not abated and will not abate. Not only is this true of the country generally, but it is true of Pennsylvania, the chief seat of protection. We now produce and export to the person about as much as in 1860. Pennsylvania produced to the person in 1860 4½ bushels of wheat, 9½ bushels of corn, and in 1875 4½ bushels of wheat and 11½ bushels of corn to the person; and so the pretense of building a home market for the products of grain fields is a sham and a cheat.

In 1860 5 per cent. of our manufactures had to seek a foreign market, in 1875 only 2 per cent. found a market abroad, 98 per cent. at home; for manufactures protection has given a home market. In 1860 not 10 per cent. of our own agricultural products were exported for market, estimating by export of wheat and corn; and in 1875 22 per cent. of our whole agricultural product had to find a foreign market in competition with the products grown by that "pauper labor" against which we have been protecting ourselves at a cost of unnumbered millions. For agricultural products protection has not and cannot give a home market.

Seek the world over and a parallel scarcely can be found where agricultural interests are so completely subordinated to those of manufactures as in this. Do our farmers know that to-day they pay for the protection of manufactures five times as much as the farmers of Great Britain, four times as much as those of France, six times as much as those of Germany, twice as much as those of monarchical Russia or Spain, four times as much as those of Italy, and twenty-five times as much as those of Belgium?

Under the system of a protective tariff established by the American Congress the agriculturists of this country must pay tribute to manufacturers year in and year out, and with all their numbers and their strength they have up to this time seemed powerless to resist it. Let Congress hereafter do justice to them by reducing the tariff on imported goods and aid them by placing in the executive council a friend to them and to their industry, whose position will entitle him to the ear of the President, and whose duty it will be to scrutinize every treaty with foreign powers and watch every act of legislation by Congress, and to advise him how far they encourage or militate against this interest.

I care but little what you may call him, whether a Commissioner or Secretary of Agriculture, it is substantial results which our farmers seek. Should it be said by those who oppose this proposition that it is an innovation upon established ideas, I reply that it is no new thing to add a Cabinet minister to the Executive Department when the interest of the people demand it. Go into the President's room of the Capitol and upon the walls you first see the picture of Washington, and then on the panels around are the heads of five Departments: Thomas Jefferson, Secretary of State; Alexander Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury; Henry Knox, Secretary of War; Samuel Osgood, Postmaster-General; and Edmond Randolph, Attorney-General; and all of these were not at first recognized as Cabinet officers. Indeed, the Postmaster-General was not recognized as an officer of the Cabinet for many years after the creation of that Department. His first recognition was, I believe, about 1830, by President Jackson. The Department of the Navy was not created until 1795, nearly nine years after Washington became President, and after the five Departments before named were created. And the Department of the Interior was not established until 1849. The idea, then, of creating a new Department is not novel, and the only pertinent question to be asked is, is it demanded by the necessities or best interests of the country? There are but few duties now devolving upon the present members of the Cabinet, when viewed with reference to substantial interests, at all comparable with those which would devolve upon a Secretary or Commissioner of Agriculture.

Under the present laws the Secretary of State is intrusted with the duties assigned to him by the President relative to foreign affairs, to correspondence, commissions or instructions to or with public ministers or consuls from the United States, or to negotiations with public ministers from foreign states or princes. The Secretary of War, to duties relative to military commissions, military forces, warlike stores, or other matters respecting military affairs; to collection of flags, transportation of troops; to meteorological observations and storm-signals. The Secretary of the Treasury, to digest and prepare plans for the improvement and management of the revenue and for the support of the public credit; superintend the collection of the revenue; grant warrants for moneys to be issued from the Treasury in pursuance of appropriations by law; and, generally such services relative to the finances as he shall be directed to perform; to the collection of duties and imposts and tonnage, and to regulate the appraisal of imports. The Attorney-General, to give his opinion to heads of Departments on any question of law arising in the administration of his Department; argue causes in the courts of the United States in which the Government is interested; exercise general superintendence and direction over the attorneys and marshals and other officers of the United States courts of all the districts in the United States and Territories as to the manner of discharging their respective duties, and publish his opinions at the expense of the Government. It is the duty of the Postmaster-General to establish and discontinue post-offices, to control the expenses incident to the service of the Department; to superintend generally the business of the Department, and execute all laws relative to the postal service and make postal arrangements and treaties with foreign countries. The Secretary of the Navy is to execute orders from the President relative to naval stores and materials and the construction, armament, equipment, and employment of vessels of war, as well as other matters connected with the naval establishment, collect flags, standards, and colors taken from the enemies of the United States by the Navy, and have prepared for navigators nautical books, charts, and maps relative to and required in navigation. The Secretary of the Interior is charged with the supervision of public business relative to the census, to the public lands of the Indians, to pension and bounty lands, to patents for inventors, to the custody and distribution of publications, to the office of education, to the Government Hospital for the Insane and the Columbia Asylum for the Deaf and Dumb, and to the exercise of the powers and duties prior to 1873 performed by the Secretary of State in relation to the Territories.

This constitutes a brief summary of all the duties of importance relating to the positions of the members of the Cabinet as at present organized; and while I am not disposed to belittle their importance or to detract from the magnitude of the duties confided to them, yet I submit that but few if any are of more commanding concern than those I have mentioned which would devolve upon the head of the Department of Agriculture should it be made an executive department of the Government.

It may then be pertinently asked again why does Congress with parsimonious hand dole out the protection and encouragement due to this great industry, and why bleed it year by year with the stiletto of the tariff? There is no interest, either great or small, that has ever asked and received so little from the Government. Modest and unpretensions in their demands, suffering from year to year for the benefit of every other interest in which any part of our people are concerned, it does seem that their patience and long suffering entitle them now surely to something more than a callous ear. When they ask that their great interest which underlies the prosperity of the whole Union shall receive the graceful recognition to which it is entitled, by giving it representation in the Executive Department of the Government, and by making annual appropriations commensurate with its importance, and arresting the greedy hands of tax-gatherers, these reasonable requests surely should be granted.

I know that this appeal will fall idly upon the ears of those who desire to use the Government for purposes of self aggrandizement and unhallowed gain, but I speak for those whose hands are unstained by plunder, upon whose shoulders the burdens of the nation must fall, and I can but indulge the hope that the dawn of a better day is at hand and that Congress will no longer refuse to accord the aid, encouragement, and protection to this industry which is demanded by every consideration of patriotism, duty, and public policy. But should it be refused, I believe that the time will speedily come when they whose rights have been menaced and trampled under foot will dictate the imperial decree that they are the fountain of power and will take care that their interests are no longer jeopardized and their rights no longer violated. We should not wait for this, for when and only when agriculture is prosperous the country revives; only then languishing industries start into life, hope and confidence are inspired, poverty is converted into plenty, barrenness into fertility, stagnation into progress, idleness into industry, and despair into hope.

PROTECTION TO AMERICAN INDUSTRY.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, the tariff question is not a new subject of inquiry and controversy. It has received the profound study and earnest discussion of generations of statesmen, both in the Old and New World, and has vexed and perplexed the nations for centuries. The names of some of the most distinguished statesmen and publicists of England, France, and Germany are inseparably associated with the discussion of this subject and the antagonistic policies of protection and free trade which have proceeded from it. In our own country it has been, since the foundation of the Government, a fertile source of controversy, to which many of the most illustrious men in our history have contributed their great ability and high authority.

Remembering, therefore, the vast consideration, continued through generations, which these policies have received, the mass of argument, theoretical and practical, bestowed upon them, and the great ability with which their respective merits and demerits have been illustrated, I have not the presumption to suppose that in addressing myself to this subject at this time, which I shall do with as little elaboration as possible, I shall either add materially to the weight of what has hitherto been said in behalf of the cause that I espouse or greatly weaken the influence of what has been uttered in support of the opposing policy. But whatever the effect, whether it be much or little, I obey the promptings of a sense of duty as the representative of a community deeply interested in the action that Congress shall take upon this question of the tariff, when I seek to give direction to legislation in this particular, which I am convinced beyond all doubt is the best the highest interests of the country demand.

Sir, there is a very wide-spread apprehension, arising from the proposed bill by the majority of the committee, which I believe to be well-founded, that the policy of protection to American industry reinaugurated in 1861, and which for nearly seventeen years has stood as a grand bulwark against the overflow of the cheap-labor products of the furnace, the forge, and the factories of Europe, and behind which the inventive genius, the industrial energy, and the commercial enterprise of our people have been encouraged and permitted to grow and expand, is in imminent danger.

Mr. Speaker, the advocates of protection, the friends of American industry, of the laborer not less than the capitalist—for the latter is not more deeply concerned in this question than the former—must meet this issue, not with abstract theories that are comprehensible only to the learned few, but with the impressive and irresistible logic of facts and experience. Upon this plane the protectionists need have no fears or misgivings. The history of protection in the United States is a vindication of that policy complete and overwhelming, while that of free trade presents some of the darkest and most deplorable chapters in the nation's experience. Let me pass in brief review some of the salient facts of the record.

The policy of protection was first asserted in 1789. In March of that year, "the first petition presented to the first Congress, before Washington's inauguration, came from the mechanics and other citizens of what was then the town of Baltimore," asking that Congress by imposing protective duties on foreign manufactures would render the country "independent in fact as well as in name." The citizens of New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Charleston, and other cities presented petitions of like character. A bill introduced in the House of Representatives by James Madison embodied the views and wishes of the petitioners. This bill was passed, and on the 4th day of July, 1789, received the signature of Washington and became a law. It was our first protective tariff, "and it was the first act of general legislation passed under the new Constitution of the United States." This act settled the right as well as the expediency of impost duties. In 1791, Alexander Hamilton, then Secretary of the Treasury, sent to Congress an argument for protection to American industry, which in its masterly and statesman-like treatment of the subject has not been since surpassed, and which supplied the principles upon which the tariff legislation down to 1816 was chiefly based. It is to be observed, however, that the protection sought by the legislation of this period was but partially realized, for the reason that the advantage enjoyed by Europe in capital, skill, and other resources, was too great to be overcome by the duties imposed, the general range of which was not above 15 per cent. England continued to send us, up to the beginning of the war of 1812, large supplies of manufactured goods, which were thrown upon the American markets at prices less than the same articles were sold at in London or Liverpool, sacrificed to the object of repressing and breaking down our rising industries. With the doubling of duties at the beginning of the war of 1812 and the exigencies of the country, our manufacturing industries were greatly stimulated, and in the succeeding three years grew vigorously—many new industries being created. The arrival of peace found the country, says Mr. Greeley in his Political Economy, "dotted with furnaces and manufactories which had suddenly grown up during the few last preceding years, under the precarious shelter of embargo and war. These, not yet fairly established in a country whose commerce was almost wholly external or confined to the seaboard, steam navigation being yet in its infancy, and canals or railroads unknown among us, found themselves suddenly exposed to a determined and resistless competition from abroad."

To meet this the tariff act of 1816, chiefly the work of John C. Calhoun, then a protectionist, and William Lowndes, was devised. But it proved utterly inadequate, except as to two or three comparatively unimportant industries. Great Britain continued to flood the American markets with the products of her manufactories at prices with which the home manufactories found it impossible to compete, and one by one in rapid succession American manufacturing establishments were closed and products of American manufacture disappeared from the markets. "All the devastation of the war," observes a distinguished writer, "had been nothing compared with the devastation and losses of manufacturing capital under the tariff of 1816." "Our manufactures" says another, "went down like grass before the mower, our agriculture and the wages of labor speedily followed. In New England I judge that fully one-fourth of the property went through the sheriff's mill, and the prostration was scarcely less general in any part of the country. I judge that more New England families were reduced from comfort to want in the years 1817-'20 than in the next half century." The testimony of this nature would fill volumes and illustrates most forcibly the disastrous effect of that sort of tariff legislation which is now demanded by a considerable faction under the specious title of a tariff for revenue with incidental protection. Under such a tariff from 1816 to 1824, a few unimportant industries did indeed escape the assaults of foreign competition, but these trifling exceptions were not sufficient to relieve this period of its memorable character as the most disastrous in our early history, a period referred to in 1832 by Henry Clay, as without a parallel since the formation of the Government in its exhibition of "wide-spread dismay and desolation." Out of this universal gloom of "dismay and desolation" the country was lifted by the tariffs of 1824 and 1828, and there ensued a period of seven years in striking contrast to a similar term that had just preceded. Never were the comparative merits of two antagonistic policies more fully and decisively illustrated. The energies of the country were revitalized, the spirit of enterprise again walked abroad in the land, capital sought labor, and labor responded to the appeal, and in their union and mutual efforts each won honorable and just reward. The nation grew in wealth and everywhere the people were prosperous, tranquil, and happy. At the very height of this grand fruition and splendid promise came the compromise tariff of 1833 with its provision for a gradual reduction of duties on manufactures to a revenue standard.

The cause of the business revulsion and the financial disaster of 1837 is as clear as the sun at noonday without a cloud in the sky, as the following figures will show:

Years.	Value of imports.
	Free of duty.	Paying duty.

These facts are worthy of careful study, and as like produces like, we ought to know that a reduction, as proposed by the bill before us, of the tariff in 1878 will produce the same effects upon the country that was produced by the ruinous tariff of 1832 and 1833. After its passage the country was flooded with foreign manufactures, and our manufacturers were driven to the wall and became bankrupt. There are hundreds living to-day and in active business, there are men in this House who still vividly remember the unhappy era from 1835 to 1842, with that desolating year of 1837 standing like a great, black, appalling chasm in a wilderness of wreck and ruin. This compromise measure, this "tariff for revenue only," bore its legitimate fruit in the final collapse alike of industry and revenue, and the despoiled and suffering country again turned to protection for the restoration of its crushed and shattered industries. It was given in the tariff of 1842, and for four years business revived, and by comparison the country was prosperous; but hardly had the wounds of the preceding disaster healed over when the act of 1846, reducing duties, stepped in to reverse the wheels and start the country again upon a retrograde march. Writing of the effects of the new tariff, Professor Bowen, in his Principles of Political Economy, states "that within three years after they began to be felt one hundred and sixty-seven out of three hundred and four blast-furnaces in Pennsylvania were out of blast and the remainder produced 49 per cent. less iron than the quantity previously manufactured, while the product of the two hundred establishments for the manufacture of wrought iron in Pennsylvania was reduced 33 per cent." He estimates also that in the iron business of the country alone forty thousand laborers were thrown out of employment. England promptly accepted the invitation which the reduced tariff offered her, and flooded our markets with her products, at first at extremely low prices, but when American manufacturers were driven to the wall, former experience was repeated, "the prices of foreign commodities were advanced and the foreign manufacturer reaped a bountiful harvest." But in spite of this disastrous and humiliating experience, Congress in 1857 legislated in the still further interest of the foreign manufacturers, and the prompt response to this aggravation of folly was the financial crash of that year, predicted by the advocates of protection as an inevitable consequence of the abandonment by Congress of the industrial interests of the country.

We shall not find in our history any term of four years more prolific of evils to the material affairs of the people of the United States than were the years 1857, 1858, 1859, and 1860. At no previous time in the country's history did want and wretchedness hold so wide-spread a reign. Never before was industrial prostration so universal and complete. Never before was the investment of capital less profitable or the rewards of labor more meager. For fourteen years we had tried a tariff for revenue only and most expensive and bitter was the price the country paid for the experiment. The alternative presented was one of utter and universal bankruptcy, public and private, or a return to the policy of protection. The Morrill tariff became a law in 1861, and was the beginning of a series of protective enactments which are still in force. What that measure and those which have supplemented it accomplished for the country is within the experience and knowledge of every member of this House. It found the country prostrate, capital without confidence, and labor without demand, sloth in the marts of commerce, hungry thousands appealing for bread, profitless ventures sapping the foundations of wealth, the rust of inaction eating its way into the very vitals of the national being. The Government, sharing inevitably in the common disaster, found its resources insufficient to meet the regular and necessary demands upon it, and the administration of James Buchanan was compelled to borrow money at a rate of interest which bore humiliating testimony to the deterioration which the national credit had suffered. The remedy supplied for the cure of the prevailing evils operated with immediate and wholesome effect. It may be fairly assumed, I grant, that the occurrence of war coincident with the enactment of this tariff operated in an important degree as a stimulus to the growth of certain industries; but without attempting to estimate the force of this influence, I have the right to say, reasoning from analogous circumstances, that the general effect produced in the restoration of industrial activity and the return of the country to a condition of prosperity was due chiefly to the re-establishment of the policy of protection. The Morrill bill was reported to the House of Representatives in March, 1860, and passed that body in the following May; and my own recollection is that the work of improvement began in anticipation of its assured final adoption by Congress, so that when it passed the Senate in February, 1861, and received the approval of President Buchanan, the current of the new industrial life had already been set in motion.

No man at this day, I venture to presume, will assert that without this policy the country could have maintained its energies during the four years' desperate struggle from 1861 to 1865, or so speedily repaired the desolating effect of that contest after its close. The protective tariff of 1860-'61 was as necessary to the preservation of the National Government as were the courage, patriotism, and self-sacrificing devotion of the people, for it stimulated the development of those resources which supply the sinews of war, and rendered us in large measure independent of a nation whose capitalists generally were not, in that trying era, the friends of the Union; and when the bitter trial was passed it remained as a beneficial influence, encouraging the people to increased endeavor, keeping open the workshops of the land for the employment of the thousands returned from military to civil life, and adding month by month, and year by year, to the wealth, power, and prosperity of the nation. But, sir, the argument in behalf of protection does not stop when it is shown that it is the only policy under which this country has ever attained to prosperity or can hope ever to reach that development of its vast resources or acquire that commanding position among the nations of the earth which ought to be the aspiration of every patriotic American to hope it may yet achieve. The facts are no less conclusive in support of the proposition that a wise system of protection, such as we have had for the past seventeen years, ultimately cheapens the prices of commodities to consumers. A few points in illustration of this will be pertinent. The wholesale price of heavy domestic sheetings ranged as follows, after our cotton manufacturers were protected: 1816, 30 cents a yard; 1819, 21 cents; 1826, 13 cents; 1829, 8½ cents; 1843, 6½ cents. English calicoes made in Manchester once sold in this country at from 25 cents to 40 cents a yard. The printing of American calicoes was not successful until after the passage of the tariffs of 1816 and 1824, because not sufficiently protected. Since the latter year the prices by the package of Merrimac prints, equal to the best Manchester, have ranged as follows: 1825, 23 cents per yard; 1830,

Domestic brown drillings were first made about 1824, and sold at 15½ cents a yard by the package. In 1860 the price had fallen to 7½ and 9 cents. The domestic manufacture of linen lawn was introduced under the stimulus afforded by the tariff of 1812, and were first sold in 1847. Similar goods imported from England in 1846 were sold at from 28 cents to 30 cents. Both foreign and American lawns were sold in 1847 at from 12 cents to 15 cents. American lawns subsequently sold as low as 9 cents a yard, and foreign lawns were driven from the market. In 1842 the prices of towel-cotton fabrics declined from ½ to ¼ of a cent per yard. Within three months after the passage of the tariff, imported cotton of an inferior quality sold at 22 cents a yard before a single cotton mill existed in the United States. "When a protection duty of 8 cents a yard was imposed and cotton mills built, the competition between the English and American manufacturers soon reduced the price of cloth to 7 cents a yard." A similar state of facts might be cited respecting the course of prices of standard woolen goods under protective tariffs.

The record of prices in the steel and iron trade, under low and high tariffs, is still more forcible and convincing as to the cheapening effect of protection; and indeed there is hardly an article manufactured among us the production of which has grown up under protective tariffs that is not to-day sold at a greatly cheaper price than was paid for it when its supply came exclusively and chiefly from the foreign manufacturer. The conclusion is inevitable, therefore, that protection tends to lower the price of manufactured goods, while it tends also to increase the market value of agricultural products and the wages of labor. These irrefutable facts wholly dispose of the free-trade assumption that protective duties are a tax upon the consumer. Upon this head Mr. Greeley, summing up the results of his investigations, observes:

While there has been an advance in the prices of our agricultural staples since the passage of our first decidedly protective tariff in 1824, there is no single manufacture protected by that tariff and by its protective successors which has not been reduced in cost to the great mass of our consumers; and that reduction is generally greatest on the articles which have been most stringently and persistently protected. Iron and its manufactures, woolen fabrics of all kinds, window-glass, delaines, ginghams, and even salt illustrate this truth.

No less erroneous is the argument that protection is the servant of monopoly, the facts being that the fault is rather in the opposite direction, since it not unfrequently operates too vigorously as an incentive, and stimulates to competition. There is, perhaps, no locality in the country which furnishes a stronger illustration of all these propositions than the congressional district which I have the honor to represent. When the present tariff went into operation there was scarcely a respectable manufacturing establishment in or about Cleveland, and the value of the annual product of the generally starving apologetics for manufactories would be overrated at $1,000,000. To-day, within a territory less in extent than that of the District of Columbia, there are a score or more of establishments, among the largest of their kind in the country, with a host of smaller ones, and in the five or six years preceding the panic of 1873 the value of the annual product of these establishments ranged from twenty-five to thirty-five millions of dollars. In the decade from 1864 to 1874 the production grew with wondrous rapidity, and the progress of the community in wealth and all the conditions which contribute to the prosperity, comfort, and happiness of a people furnishes a notable chapter in the history of the country's advance in material possessions and power.

In order to further illustrate the cheapening influence of protection, I would call your attention to an exhibit furnished by the Cleveland Rolling Mill Company, whose mills are among the largest in the United States, and who enjoy the enviable reputation of having continued in active operation throughout the period of business depression which began in 1873 and still prevails. In this exhibit will be found some very interesting data relating to the course of prices of the products of these mills:

Years.	Iron rails per ton.	Steel rails per ton.	Railroad spikes per pound.	Railroad bolts per pound.	Merchant and other iron per pound.

1865	42 50	6½ cents	7½ cents	6 cents
1866	40 00	5 cents

The tariff question is simply one of protection to the American laborer; and view it as you may, sir, from any and from every standpoint of observation, it resolves itself into this, protection to the laborer, as the price of an article is according to the price of producing it. Now, it takes the same number of pounds of iron ore, the same number of pounds of lime-rock, the same number of pounds of coal, and the same number of days' work to make a ton of pig-iron in England or Germany as it does in Ohio. What makes the difference in the price in the market? Why is pig-iron worth more per ton in Ohio than in England or in Russia? Simply because the wages paid the laborer are higher in Ohio than in the countries named. In the manufacture of iron the average weekly wages paid to puddlers (in gold) are $16.24 in the United States, $8.75 in England, $8 in France, $6 in Belgium, $1.39 in Russia. (Special report of David A. Wells, in 1868.)

If the American laborer is willing to work for the same wages, to live in the same way, with as few of the comforts of actual life and with none of its luxuries, as the laborer in Europe, then let him ask for the removal of all duties on iron and its manufacture, and he will be at once accommodated, and his wife and his children will enter upon a new kind of existence, and if he does not they will soon find out the difference, and call loudly upon the Congress of the United States to protect the laborer in his wages, so as to give his family a better house, better food, better furniture, better clothes, and better everything that enters into the things that make life happy.

Sir, I stand up here to-day to speak for labor, always honorable, always useful; to speak for willing and skillful hands, educated well and thoroughly in all kinds of mechanical work, so that the profits may be divided between capital and labor, and both be benefited mutually. The laborer is only prosperous when capital is profitably employed; and the workman who is paid regularly his wages should remember that he assumes no risk, that he takes no hazard, that he invests not in furnaces and rolling-mills, shops, and factories; that he has no chances of destruction by fire or water, no fear of bad debts or failures, as the capitalist has who puts his money into business. He only wants to be sure of his wages, and he knows not of the sleepless nights or anxious days of the employer. When capital has good dividends and the laborer has good pay their interests are mutual and the same, and there should be no antagonism between them in this land, where the apprentice and the journeyman of to-day is in a few years, by industry and skill and economy, the capitalist and employer of to-morrow.

I represent, Mr. Speaker, a district largely interested in the production of iron and its manufactures, consisting of blast-furnaces, steel and iron rail mills, boiler-plate, sheet, and wire mills, foundries, bridge-works, spring-works, steel screws, &c. The number of tons of iron and steel of all kinds produced in these works per annum is 377,000 tons and the number of workmen employed some 7,000. I regret to say that all these industries are now greatly depressed and are anxiously waiting for the dawn of a better day. It will not come if the protection to labor is removed. The city of Cleveland contains about 160,000 inhabitants; 7,000 workmen are employed in the furnaces and mills. If each workman represents a family of 5 persons, then 35,000 of the 160,000 are supported directly by the capital invested in these iron and steel works; nearly one-fourth of the population of Cleveland are dependent for their daily bread upon these establishments. It is not strange, then, sir, that I am interested for the laborer and stand here to protect him and to ask for him good wages, in order that he may live well. I would call special attention to the production of one establishment in my district for the past year, The Cleveland Rolling Mill Company, and to the wages paid.

Let the tariff duties on iron and steel alone; do not by reducing them cut the sinews of the right arm of the laborer, and when confidence is again restored, capital again employed profitably, and labor everywhere in demand, the pay-roll of this and all other establishments will be largely increased, and the agriculturist, the gardeners, the grocers, the merchants, the traders, will all again be prosperous. It is idle for an American Congress to talk about free trade or to undertake to legislate in behalf of free trade with two thousand millions of public debt upon us, the interest and principal of which must be paid, or our Republic be "a hissing and by-word among the nations of the earth."

Make changes where changes are demanded; let in raw material free of duty that we do not produce, and give our labor the profit of its manufacture, and all will be well. But to impose duty on raw material and to lessen the duty on the manufactured product, like the proposed duty of 10 per cent. (in the first bill) on raw silk, is a policy at once suicidal and ruinous to the silk manufacturers in our country, as the product of the silk factors amounted in value, for the year 1876, to $26,953,103.

THE FARMER INTERESTED IN PROTECTION.

Here is an important fact, and one that clearly shows how much the farmer is interested in the success of manufactures and in the building up of manufacturing villages and cities. Fifty-seven of the counties in Ohio have each a less population than the iron and steel establishments and industries in the city of Cleveland give employment and support to. In other words, the families of the men employed in these iron and steel works consume more of farm products than either one of the fifty-seven counties in Ohio. The counties of Geauga and Lake, forming part of the district of my honorable colleague on this floor, [Mr. GARFIELD,] have not so large a population as is represented by the workers in the iron and steel establishments of Cleveland.

Can the free-traders say with any truth or reason to the farmers of Ohio, your interests lie in the direction of foreign markets for your wheat, corn, beef, pork, butter, and cheese? A home market is the best market, and this we can make only by protecting the labor of our country, employed in the manufacturing establishments, and by producing at home articles we consume in our families.

Mr. Speaker, a tariff bill in the interest of the importers of foreign goods, wares, and merchandise, and of a few hundred sugar plantations of the South, never can pass this House and become a law; neither is it reasonable to ask for such a law.

As a still further proof of the correctness of the position I take—that a protective tariff, properly adjusted, has a tendency to cheapen rather than increase the price of our manufactured products—I will call your attention to the better grades of cast steel, commonly called "best cast steel." In 1857 English manufacturers imported this steel and paid a duty of 12½ per cent. ad valorem. If we take the custom-house valuation of the steel, the rate of duty paid was about 1½ cents per pound. Notwithstanding that low rate of duty the consumer had to pay for "best cast steel," on an average, 15 cents per pound, the maximum price being 16½ cents, while now the same quality of "best cast steel" can be purchased from the same English steel manufacturers' agents on this side of the Atlantic at 13 cents per pound, and this, too, it must be remembered, when we have the highest rate of duties on steel ever before levied by the Government.

The question naturally arises, What has caused this reduction in the price of "best cast steel?" Why is it that the consumer can now purchase a quality of "best cast steel," equal to any ever imported to this country, at a cost equal to $40 per ton less than he was compelled to pay under the lowest tariff ever levied on steel? The answer is plain; the cause is obvious. Immediately upon the enactment of our present tariff laws, capitalists, feeling encouraged, invested in the manufacture of steel about $11,000,000. Workshop doors were thrown open to thousands of skilled artisans, who received employment at remunerative wages, and notwithstanding the many perplexities and vexations attendant upon the introduction of this then comparatively new branch of industry, with determination, energy, and perseverance, the venture was highly successful, and notwithstanding the sharp competition, home and foreign, which caused the enormous reduction in the price of cast steel to the consumer, the manufacturers received a fair living profit on their investments. The same can be said of the lower or cheaper grades of steel, which to-day can be bought at prices far below what the consumers were compelled to pay for cast steel of foreign manufacture when the duties levied upon the importations of this article were the very lowest.

Our protective tariff has done even more. Under its fostering influences our once sickly and weak industries have been enabled to grow up strong, and able to cope with their formidable adversaries on the other side of the Atlantic, so that now our manufacturers by reason of our improved machinery are gradually getting a footing for the sale of their products in the markets of foreign nations, as will be seen by reference to the following table:

This wonderful result, I submit, could never have been attained under the fallacious policy of free trade. But let us go a little further with a view to ascertain what has been accomplished by way of exportations in other branches of manufactures and industries.

Under the influence of the policy of protection inaugurated in 1861, we are fast becoming a nation to whom the nations of the earth will pay tribute, and there is no reason why we cannot supply the markets of the world with everything our workshops farms, and mines are capable of producing. The following table we are doing in the way of exporting some of the products of the of statistics, collated from the most reliable sources, shows what farm:

Table of statistics showing domestic exports to different countries.

In the exportation of the one article of cheese alone a wonderful progress is exhibited. Eighty-seven years ago the exportation of this article was 144,734 pounds, while for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, the exportations amounted in pounds to the enormous sum of 107,364,666. The progress made by this branch of industry will be best seen by reference to the following table, showing for every fifth year the amount of cheese exported for that year and also for the years 1876 and 1877:

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, the United States exported pork to sixty-two foreign countries, to the value of six millions and a quarter dollars; starch, nearly $500,000; tobacco, nearly twenty-nine millions; sugar, four and a half millions. The amount realized in agricultural implements exported has been, for the year ending June 30, 1877, fanning-mills, $10,534; horse-powers, $24,297; mowers and reapers, $765,249; plows and cultivators, $129,235; all others, $886,538; total, $1,815,873. The Indian corn exported amounted to nearly forty-two millions; wheat, nearly twenty-two millions; glass and glassware, $672,400; stoves and parts of stoves, $742,300; wearing-apparel, nearly $700,000; household furniture, $1,700,412; merchandise, $607,532,228; of which amount $515,104,208 was carried by foreign vessels. That we are steadily gaining ground under the protective policy of the Government is readily seen by comparison of our exports when our manufacturers received little or no protection from the Government with those when the Government threw its protecting care around the industries of our country. Notwithstanding the depression in trade everywhere and business generally during the past year, a most encouraging showing is presented in the following table, compiled from the data collected by the Bureau of Statistics, showing exports and imports for the twelve months ending December 31, 1877:

Statement showing the imports and exports for the twelve months ending December 31.

Mr. Speaker, in view of all these facts, which stand out along the pathway of our national history like so many beacon-lights to show us the way in safety to the harbor of our destination, prosperity; in the full light of all the lessons learned through hard and bitter struggles such as few other nations have ever experienced; in the vivid recollections of the cost of past blunders and in the presence of what we witness to-day as the result of a wise and judicious policy fairly tried and tested through a period of seventeen years, I ask shall we now, at the instigation of political ambition or from whatever influence or combination of influences, turn upon and rend ourselves by dashing down the barriers which staid the tide of desolation and ruin which threatened to engulf the nation, and whose maintenance has proved such a signal benefit to our people? I have not time during the hour allotted me to discuss in detail the provisions of the tariff bill reported to this House by the Committee of Ways and Means, and can only refer briefly to a few of its provisions.

On cotton goods, glass, iron, steel, and many other articles, the committee have reduced the rate of duties. On pig-iron the duty is now $7 per ton, in the bill of the committee it is $5 per ton, a reduction of $2. Scrap-iron is now $6, in this bill it is $4 per ton, a difference of $2. Wrought-iron is $8, in this bill $6, a difference of $2. Is there any necessity, is there any reason for this reduction? Can our depressed iron interests stand up under this reduction? Can the Representatives on this floor from Tennessee, Missouri, Michigan, Ohio, Pennsylvania, New York, and New Jersey stand here and consent to see the great iron interests of their States thus slaughtered, and that, too, at an hour when hundreds of furnaces are out of blast and the machinery of rolling-mills is silent, and millions of capital and tens of thousands of laborers are awaiting anxiously the action of Congress on this bill? I confess to the greatest surprise when I heard my distinguished colleague [Mr. SAYLER] utter on this floor, during the debate upon this bill, on the 15th ultimo, the following language:

I would like to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I represent probably as much iron as anybody; and when he makes the broad statement that the schedule proposed in this bill is destructive of the iron interests of the country he makes a statement that is not justified by the opinion of the most intelligent men engaged in that business.

If this be the sentiment of the iron manufacturers in his district, I answer him and this House, it is not the sentiment of those located in mine; they protest against this bill with unmistakable emphasis. I am told by those who are engaged in the manufacture of woolen goods that under the provisions of this bill three-fourths of all the woolen mills in the country would be compelled to stop operations. I submit the following carefully prepared table, showing the comparative duties under the present tariff and under that proposed by this bill:

Wool exhibit.

	Present duty.		Wood tariff.		Reduction.
	Duty in cents.	Duty per ct.	Duty in cents.	Duty per ct.	In cts.	Per ct.
Mestiza wool, competing with California, Texas, and Oregon.	11.3	95	4.2	35	7	60
Australian wool, competing with Ohio.....	13.3	44	10.5	35	2.7	21
Carpet wools not grown in the United States.....	3	27	3.8	35	*.8	*26

*Increase.

The proposed bill puts the duty on Mestiza wools at .8 of a cent less than that imposed by the tariff of 1864, under which there were imported in 1866—

	Pounds.
Mestiza (South American) wools.....	37,000,000
Cape of Good Hope.....	7,500,000
Total.....	44,500,000

Nearly all are wools competing with our Merino wools.

In 1863, the year after the present tariff went into operation, the importation sank to 6,250,000 pounds, a diminution of 33,250,000 pounds, or sixth-sevenths of the whole amount imported in 1866.

The place of this diminished importation was supplied by the growth of California and Texas wools which were stimulated by protection with the following results:

In 1860 the wool production was 60,000,000 pounds. In 1866 it reached—

	Pounds.
In the old States.....	120,000,000
In the Pacific States.....	17,000,000
Total.....	137,000,000
In 1877 it reached—
In the old States.....	117,000,000
In the Pacific States.....	91,000,000
Total.....	208,000,000

A prodigious increase in the class of wools especially protected by the present tariff and especially injured by the Wood bill.

Ohio had in 1870 223 woolen mills; Massachusetts, 185; New York, 252; Connecticut, 108; Illinois, 109; Indiana, 175; Tennessee, 145; Pennsylvania, 457.

Can the Representatives from the New England States particularly permit this? Who is asking for this measure? I have watched with care the records of the present House, and can recall no interest which has demanded the passage of this bill; on the contrary, there has been an almost universal prayer from all classes for its prompt and certain defeat.

I will leave, for discussion, the specific articles in detail in the bill as they come up in their regular order, and will content myself at this time by saying that the average reduction of the duty on imported goods in this bill as compared to the present law is about 8 per cent.

By a careful computation, taking the receipts from customs for last year as a basis, the decrease in the revenue under this bill will be $9,403,000. This is a long stride in the direction of free trade, and directly antagonizes the principles of protection to American manufactures, and is framed more in the interests of foreign nations than of our own country. I am confirmed in this opinion by the London Engineer of February 22, 1878, from which I quote an editorial article referring to this bill:

British ironmasters may take heart when Pittsburgh walls. An iron trade which maintains a tottering and miserable existence with all the help of a tremendous tariff, has little chance of a prolonged life; and our contemporary may rest assured that America cannot make iron as cheap as British ironmasters will make and sell it before they retire from the competition. As we have said, we must make and sell iron. America has no such necessity, and it is easy to see that, do what American ironmasters may, the end will be the same. They will be undersold by England until capital is driven out of the American trade, and its dimensions are reduced to reasonable limits, and its operations confined to the remunerative production of those special brands for which certain districts have long enjoyed a high reputation; and the end is probably not far off. Already the American iron trade is contracting. In the whole of Missouri and its borders not a pound of iron is being made, twenty-three furnaces having been put out of blast. Let but a moderate reduction be made in the tariff—and there is every prospect that the free-trade party will achieve at least a partial success—and the well-blown bubble will burst, and the iron trade of the United States will recede to the legitimate limits which we have indicated. The pinch may be felt severely for a time, but the country will be better without than with an exotic manufacture, which cannot live without what is, in plain terms, a national subsidy.

This is the construction England puts upon this bill—this is the exultation English capitalists feel at the now, what they term, "tottering" condition of the great iron interests of this country. Sir, is this the feast gentlemen on this floor are invited to attend? Is this the splendid banquet that the Congress of this nation is about to prepare for the iron manufacturers of this country? I greatly overestimate the intelligence of this body and mistake its sentiments if this premature exultation is not doomed to an early disappointment.

I do not plead for a prohibitory tariff. I believe in good, healthy, but not ruinous competition. I am not among those who would surround our country with a Chinese wall and declare all those not within its hallowed precincts barbarians or bandits and close the gates against all comers. On the contrary I would welcome to our shores, from whatever Christian land, all who elect to come possessing the skill and willingness to earn their bread by honest toil.

The beneficial influence of a protective policy in immigration is strikingly demonstrated in our history. While our industry remained almost exclusively agricultural we failed to attract any considerable immigration. The total number of immigrants for the forty years which followed the establishment of our independence did not exceed 300,000; while during the next forty years, by comparison the manufacturing era, our annual increase of population from this source amounted from a maximum of 10,199 to one of 427,833, and our aggregate accession of inhabitants from abroad was about 4,000,000. During the decade from 1860 to 1870, in spite of our great civil war, the gain to our population from immigration did not fall far short of 2,000,000. The greater portion of this addition was composed of skilled artisans and sturdy workers who entered our mines and our workshops and thus aided in the development of the resources of our country. The panic of 1873 struck a disastrous blow at this source of national gain, as it did at most others, but we have only to maintain the policy which hitherto has invited and stimulated the inflow of population to find the tide again turned in our favor and to swell to proportions which will satisfy every demand.

I am not solicitous in this matter chiefly or primarily with respect to the interests of capital. It may be stated as a general proposition that capital can take care of itself. There are, however, occasions and conditions when capitalists are largely at the mercy of circumstances, when investments become unprofitable, and the withdrawal of capital or its transfer to other employments is accomplished only at sacrifices more or less severe; and at such times it may be expedient or necessary in the common interests that whatever relief is practicable through legislation should be extended. But as a rule special legislation in the interest of capital is undesirable, unnecessary, and, if persisted in, cannot fail ultimately to work harm to the mass of the people.

Labor, however, occupies a very different position. It is, to a greater or less degree, dependent; and while indeed national progress and individual comfort and prosperity are impossible of attainment without it, the bare fact of its necessity does not always determine the measure of its just reward. In a Government such as ours, where the power is in the hands of the people, and the well-being and prosperity of the nation depend upon the will of the people, it must appear to be the policy of wise statesmanship to do all that is possible to be done for improving the condition morally, socially, intellectually, and materially of that great body of the people which represents the ranks of what is commonly designated the working classes, are now and must, under aegis of republican institutions, be the arbiters of the political destinies of the nation. And how is this to be practically and surely accomplished unless by a policy which permits the growth and prominence of a system of diversified industries, which, while affording the widest scope for the investment and operations of capital, allows also the most liberal latitude for the employment of labor? A diversity of pursuits is indispensable to the general activity and enduring prosperity, and it is this principle which is at the very foundation of the American system inaugurated by the great and wise men who founded our Government, most of whom were farmers, but they recognized the fact that the upbuilding and diversification of manufactures among us was a necessity alike to the prosperity and growth of agriculture and the just recompense of labor, and with one voice they pronounced for protection as the only means by which to bring about a consummation of the desired end.

Sir, national industry is national wealth; and the policy which secures productive employment to the greater portion of a nation's population, consults her highest prosperity and most vital interests. It is the purpose of protection to do this, and history demonstrates most conclusively that it has never failed. As Mr. Clay said in 1832, so may we say to-day, that—

Protection has been to us a sheet-anchor of prosperity, a mainspring of progress.

Whenever we have abandoned it or made a compromise with the opposing policy, as we are being invited to do to-day by the friends of the British manufacturers, gloom, disaster, and misery have been the hard and bitter penalties of our folly. Whenever we have returned and adhered to the policy of protection, the sunshine of prosperity has illumined our pathway, and our people have been happy and contented. The great truth uttered by the late eminent statesman of France, Thiers, should be ever present with us as a motto and guide:

A nation never built up successfully a system of domestic manufactures without a protective tariff.

Sir, we have as yet reached but the first stage of the great destiny which awaits this nation, if the wisdom, the patriotism and the self-reliance that the past ought to teach us are not ignored. With territory capable of sustaining a population of two hundred millions; with the vast wealth of the nation; in possession of almost every kind of minerals that contribute to the necessities and comfort of man hardly explored beyond its surface; with a variety of climate which permits the cultivation of nearly every product of the soil that enters into the use of man, and with natural highways of commerce and travel, unequalled in any other portion of the globe—in view of all this, what is there in the range of possibility that a free, enterprising, and enlightened people thus favored, cannot accomplish for the still further advancement of their interests? To be sure, we have had some severe experience, but the native energy and pluck of the American people have outlived disaster; and those qualities are now slowly but surely lifting us out of the slough of business depression in which we, with other nations, have so long been struggling, and from the worst consequences of which we have been shielded by the beneficent guardianship of protection. Let us then cast no stone, however small, at the policy which has been the bulwark of our prosperity in the past, and which, in the light of all that has been done, we have the highest reason for believing, will be our security and safeguard in the future. "History repeats itself." Be it our task, then, to give such wise direction to events that the repetition shall be to the honor, glory, and increased prosperity of our country.

TAXATION.

MR. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I propose to address the House for a short time upon a question of the very highest importance to the people of this country. The subject in all its bearings, in its magnitude and interest, is next to the preservation of constitutional liberty; and it well becomes the Representatives of the American people to bestow upon it their calmest and most earnest consideration. I allude, of course, to the subject of taxation.

In what I shall say I shall endeavor in the main to discuss the principles involved, and hence shall have no occasion to introduce tabular statements of trade and commerce, the prices of manufactured articles at different times in the world's history, and matters of similar character. These I shall leave to such persons as prefer to conduct the discussion in that way, and who oftentimes draw from them conclusions which are not warranted by the premises which are laid down.

I do not wish that any one shall misunderstand the position which I shall assume, or the views which I entertain. For this reason I state, in the outset, that I have a direct personal interest in one of the manufacturing industries, and hence, besides public considerations, wish that all similar industries may flourish in every part of our domain where they may be established. I desire that the wealth of the country, of all kinds, shall be properly and healthfully developed, and that prosperity may attend all the avocations in which our people may engage. But I wish that no one industry shall feed upon the others and while it grows and fattens the others shrink and pine away, or at best do not improve. This gain of the one at the expense of others, is the great evil of our present financial system; an evil which has largely contributed to the stagnation of business, and the depressed condition of nine-tenths of the people of the country. So long as it is allowed to exist it will be vain, in my opinion, to expect a complete restoration of genuine prosperity.

I lay it down as a financial postulate, (alike applicable to the affairs of men individually and the aggregations of men called governments,) that whatever all men of business intelligence will do in the management of their private affairs, if allowed perfect freedom of action, is true wisdom. I do not think that this proposition can be gained. In matters of trade and business intercourse all men will "buy where they can buy cheapest and sell where they can get the best price." Even the most enthusiastic and apparently sincere advocates of the pursuit of what is called the protective policy on the part of the Federal Government will themselves adopt the very course which I have indicated, as is clearly shown by their petitions presented to Congress to admit free of duty all articles needed by them in the prosecution of their business. And this very wish illustrates the absolute impolicy on the part of Congress of a resort to the violation of this cardinal principle of political economy. Whenever Congress does so resort the evil effects of all infractions of the right will inevitably ensue; and though by the departure some few interests may flourish, the general prosperity is seriously affected.

Absolute free trade cannot be had so long as the country depends at all upon a tax on imports, to be paid by the consumer in order that the Government may be supported. Any tax upon goods brought into this country from other lands is an infraction of the laws of unrestricted trade, increases the prices which the consumer must pay for the articles imported, and hence is, pro tanto, protective. Now, to a just and equitable schedule of import duties, keeping in view steadily the legitimate purposes of the tax, and which bears equally upon all the industries of our people, no man can entertain any serious objection, provided he is willing to contribute in any way for the defense of his life, liberty, or estate. To such I am not opposed; but, on the contrary, I regard such a system as absolutely necessary, not only to supply the means of maintaining government, but to avoid what is to our people a more harassing and odious mode of taxation, and one against which the masses of mankind are much disposed to murmur. But I do object, in the name of the people whose interests I represent and whose views I regard it as my duty to reflect, in the name, as I believe, of nine-tenths of the American people who have any opinions which they dare call their own, to a system which protects and fosters a few industries and brings benefits to a comparatively small number of our population, while it places "burdens grievous to be borne" on the great mass of our people, who are thus forced to purchase what they may need at an advance in the price over what it would be if a more equitable policy marked the legislation of the country. The "protective policy" must increase the market value of the product which it shelters or those interested in making the product would not become its advocates. It must also affect in its operations and influence a majority of the people or it would really be no protection at all. It is therefore a tax on the consumer for the benefit of the producer. It is "robbing Peter to pay Paul." It is taking the substance of the majority to enrich the minority. Can such a system be right; can it be justified by any principle of equity? To my mind it is entirely indefensible.

I have admitted that absolute free trade is impracticable at this time, even if it were desirable. If adopted, it would produce a great shock to many industries which have grown up in the belief that the Government would continue to rely upon a tax on imports to raise its revenues, and thus increase the price of imported articles, giving an advantage to the extent of the tax imposed to such of them as might be manufactured in our own territory. No one proposes to admit all articles of foreign growth or manufacture free of duty. All agree that some tax should be laid upon many of them as a means of revenue, and all know that, to the extent to which this tax is imposed, advantage is given to the domestic producer. What I and those who concur with me desire is that these duties be laid in such a way as to raise sufficient funds for governmental support with the least burden upon the people, contending that such a levy will work injustice to none and advance the real interests of the great body of our fellow-citizens. On the other hand, they who advocate the enhancement of the price of articles imported, so that the domestic manufacturer can compete with the foreign one, who, to use their language, employs "pauper labor," insist that by such a course we add to the wealth of the country by a development of its resources. This is the difference between us. Even if they are right in their statement of the effects of the policy, it does not follow that the Government would be warranted in producing such a desirable end by a violation of a principle of that equity which ought to be the foundation-stone of every political organization. Injustice should never be done in the expectation that some benefit shall ensue.

In my opinion, the people of the several States, when they ratified the Constitution of the United States, never intended that the power granted to Congress "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises" should be used for any other purpose than to provide a means of meeting the expenses of the Federal Government. Such must be the conviction, as I conceive, of every one who will read the articles in the Federalist, on the subject of taxation, written by Alexander Hamilton, who, it is well known, was disposed to claim for the United States the fullest powers which the most liberal or latitudinarian construction will warrant. The idea evolved in these papers is revenue; and nowhere is there the slightest allusion to a power of discrimination in the adjustment of the duties, which would enable the Congress to discard that principle altogether and establish a system tending to defeat the very objects of the grant. And yet, such has been and will continue to be the inevitable effect of a policy which is founded upon the idea which will allow a prohibition of the importation of all articles which can come into competition with the real or desired industry of American citizens; and thus force a resort to direct taxes, by which that small class who have a practical monopoly may entirely escape the touch of the tax-gatherer.

But, Mr. Speaker, the people were told years ago that the protective features of the revenue laws were only needed during the infancy of our manufacturing enterprises, and that in a short while these would arrive at the maturity of man's estate and need no further fostering care. In other words, the declaration was made that if the people would submit, in a spirit of patriotism, to the payment of higher prices for articles which they consumed, the manufacturers of those commodities on our side of the Atlantic would then be able to take care of themselves and enter into easy and successful competition with all the nations of the earth. These glowing promises were made as far back as sixty years ago. From the demands which are now made by the manufacturers, backed doubtless at their suggestion and under their influence by the persons in their employment, that happy period of manly strength has not yet arrived, and these interests will remain for many years to come in their swaddling clothes, depending in their helplessness upon the enforced contributions of a large majority of the people of this country. The plea used is covered under the shallow pretense of sustaining the interests of the laboring-man, and is a species of demagogism entirely too transparent to deceive. The schemes for continuing burdens upon the consumers are only using the laboring-man as a cloak under which they may continue to revel in an ill-gotten prosperity. They seem to forget that there is any other "laboring-man" except the one who works in a forge or a mill, and keep out of view the existence of the thousands who delve at other occupations and who are quite as much entitled to beneficent consideration. How much longer will the great bulk of this people submit to such unjust and iniquitous exactions? While the favored few have increased in wealth and power and the localities in which they live have attained great apparent prosperity the servient masses have been proportionately impoverished. The consumer has had no fair equivalent from the manufacturing class, but has been all the while a mere "hewer of wood and drawer of water."

In reply to this we are told that a diversity of industry is essential to the prosperity and independence of any country, and the agriculturist is especially the recipient of advantages in the consequent establishment of home markets for the sale of his surplus products. A diversity of pursuits is indeed highly desirable, but such diversity should be the result of the voluntary acts of the parties concerned and should not be the factitious consequence of unjust legislation. It will exist whenever it is to the interest of the people that it should, and all attempts to expedite it by the hot-bed process must be to produce injury to people in general. But the home market whose value is so earnestly urged does not, I apprehend, have much influence upon the price of agricultural products. This is regulated almost entirely by the demands of the foreign market.

According to my views, the whole system of protection is violative of those laws which the Almighty has established, in part, for the preservation of the peace of the nations, by the result of an interchange of commodities. It was never intended that they should be entirely independent of one another. If it had been, we should have seen each one capable of producing every article which it might need for its necessities or for its convenience. This, however, is far from being the case. We are mutually dependent, and "cannot live unto ourselves." It is the part of wisdom, therefore, not to interfere by legislation with the natural and necessary commercial intercourse, but allow the freedom of an exchange of commodities, so far as the same shall be consistent with the collection of revenue.

It may be a proper subject of inquiry, in order to determine the force of the argument used by the advocates of higher prices for manufactured goods, that protection (or higher prices) by diversifying industry establishes a home market, to see what are the real effects of the policy which they advocate. By forcing the consumer to pay more for the clothing and other articles which he uses the domestic manufacturer is enabled to compete with foreign labor and skill, and hence he establishes a home market for the products of others instead of competing with them. This enhances the price of their commodities, and the result is that both manufacturer and consumer increase in wealth. This is the theory of the men who want others taxed for what they are pleased to call the mutual benefit. Is the theory a true one?

A very little examination, I think, will show that it cannot be. From whom does the manufacturer get the means of purchasing the products of his neighbor? He sells to the consumer the product of his looms for clothing and other domestic uses, at a certain percentage more per yard than it would cost but for the intervention of Congress in the imposition of protective, or partially or wholly prohibitive, duties. Now with this very money, thus obtained, he buys his bread from the consumers. If the consumer pays 25 per cent. more for his clothes, his shoes, "his spades, his mattocks, and his hoes," and all things else which he needs, to the persons who manufacture them under the bounty of the law than he would have to pay but for the law, and can get the same advance for his products out of the manufacturer to whom he sells and the mutual sales are equal, no damage is done. But the beautiful theory does not work out in that way. The partially prohibitive duty forces the farmer to buy at the advanced rates the manufactured article, while practically the manufacturer has the whole world from which to purchase what he wants. Protection is worth nothing to the great bulk of the produce of the soil, for no people can really compete with our agriculturists in the general line of his productions. This body of men is so large that they compete with themselves and they keep down the market, while the manufacturer is generally free from that law of trade by the operations of the tariff.

Indeed there never is really any competition between the protected manufacturers until their products become as large as or larger than the demands of the consumer. The agricultural product in this country is always much greater than the demand of the manufacturing consumer, and hence the price is not materially affected by the home market, but depends almost exclusively upon the wants of other nations. But the strangest part of the whole argument is that the protected class actually wants to beget competition by destroying competition, and thus creating a monopoly, which is "contrary to the genius of a free State, and ought not to be allowed."

Can a people become rich as compared with others who have little or no intercourse with the outside world? I admit that they may make themselves really self-sustaining. I admit that they may produce all which they consume by curtailing to some extent their wants, but this, so far as each individual is concerned, is but a revolving process, which is continually shifting money from one pocket to the other, enlarging the possessions of one while it diminishes those of another. The true increase above that which is rational, slow, and steady, comes from the balances of trade; from selling to others more than is purchased from them. Now, unjust discriminations against the trade of other nations is sure to beget retaliation and end in commercial disaster to the people who resort to it.

This country is now feeling the fatal influence of this suicidal policy in the partial destruction of its foreign trade, and it will continue to do so until a wiser and more liberal policy shall prevail. It is true that we now have this balance in our favor, but the great part of that is due to the depression which disables the large majority of our people from purchasing at all. The benefits of this accrue to a very small number of persons. The self-sustaining policy is not always wisdom; for it may be that it is purchased at a far greater cost than it is worth, and will result in making the great mass of our people really poorer than they would be by unrestrained intercourse. The approach which we now have to it, is maintained at the expense of the millions, and but very few indeed derive any substantial benefit.

But we are often told that high tariffs make cheap goods, and by this delusive statement, paradoxical in appearance and in reality, the consumers are to be cheated by the false hopes which it creates. Is the paradox true? If it is, is it not exceedingly strange that the men who manufacture are the advocates of a policy which cheapens the goods which they make? Are they the only patriots in the country—the only persons who are willing to sacrifice their personal interests that the land may become rich, powerful, and happy? Even if goods do get to be cheaper after some years of a high protective tariff, it does not follow by any means that the reduction in prices is the result of the cause which is alleged. It may come from various other causes, and especially from the development which exists all over the world. The light of advancement is not confined to one part of the western hemisphere. But suppose the reduced prices in one year or one decade are attributable solely to the high taxes on importations imposed at a preceding period, is it not clear that the great body of the people have only paid excessive rates for years in the purchase of their supplies in order that they may be able to buy at lower rates? Is it wise to pay 20 per cent. for money in the hope that after a while the borrower may be able to get it at 5 per cent.? What are the borrower's advantages from that? And yet this is just what the consumer is forced to do for the "glorious privilege of being independent." He is paying out of his pocket his earnings, whether hard or easy, to enable the manufacturer to engage in enterprises by which he at least hopes to find profitable employment for his capital. Thus, to accomplish what we are told is a national policy—a policy of independence of all the nations of earth—the consumer is made to bear all the burdens which are held to be essential to its establishment.

But then it is said that the country gets richer even if the consumers perish, and the aggregate of wealth is the thing which should chiefly concern the legislative power; for it must as a matter of wise statesmanship so direct public affairs that we shall at least have a "splendid" if not "a happy land." This is indeed a joyous consolation to that class of our people. They should take pride in beholding the glories which follow the accretive wealth of others, even while they themselves "grunt and sweat under a weary life." Such is not my idea of the aim of government. My conception of it is that its object is "to provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty." I do not deny that under the protective policy certain kinds of wealth are vastly increased; but I am far from being convinced that there is any improvement in the general condition of the people growing out of the taxation of the consumer. The hoardings of one class are only what it has gained from the means of the other. The increase and prosperity are therefore only apparent, and the independent, glorious, and wealthy country "boasts of a florid vigor not its own."

As an evidence of the alleged beneficial results of the protective or taxing policy, we are often reminded that the skill and enterprise of American mechanism, sustained and nourished by that policy, is even now offering manufactured cotton goods for sale in the markets of England. My colleague on the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and the War of 1812, [Mr. EVANS, of Pennsylvania,] recently made that fact (?) the subject of a part of his tariff speech in this House, and on it indulged in rhapsodies over the irrepressible genius of American industry, and its full capacity to wrestle with the energies of Great Britain, sustained as they are by what is called "pauper labor." Pennsylvania is a unit upon the subject of "protection," as it is generally believed, and its democracy even, to use the language of another, is "pure irony." To tax other people for the benefit of her industries, is indeed the "keystone" of her politics. Doubtless she thinks it is all WRIGHT, (right,) but I think it is KILLINGER, (killing her.)

Now, if the manufacturers of cotton goods can send their products to England for competitive sale in her markets, it is perfectly clear that that business needs no protection at all—not even that which a revenue tax would provide. The argument of the gentleman is therefore destructive of his own position, and shows the utter unsoundness of his illustration. If this is one of the results of protection, or high taxation, (and I do not admit it,) how long will it be before that same indomitable energy and intelligent skill will furnish the English people with their agricultural implements, their ships, their railroad iron, their cutlery, and thus destroy the manufacturing supremacy of the island empire? When that is done, what will poor England do? In what will her people engage so that they may be able to buy our surplus agricultural products? Being able now, as we are proudly told, to manufacture the raw cotton more cheaply than she is, what will become of the Liverpool cotton market, and where will the South find a competitor for her great staple? Neither France nor Germany will be, and our chief product, which was once falsely said to be "king," will be utterly and hopelessly dethroned, at the mercy of domestic speculators and gamblers. With this glorious future for America, we shall be obliged to abandon the use of the power to levy taxes upon imports, for there will be none of any consequence to be taxed, and resort to the hallowed system of "internal revenue" whereby to raise the "sinews" of peace as well as of "war." I confess that I do not think that "happy time is coming," for several generations at least; and I would deplore the fulfillment of the prophecy as one of the greatest curses which could befall the country.

As one of the reasons why this Congress should not touch the tariff at all, we are reminded that there has been no demand for it in the way of petitions upon the part of the people whose wrongs we allege, for they have not cried out in their distresses, and shown their sorrows by appeals for redress. It is true that they have sent up no memorials asking relief from the burdens which oppress them. The great body of the consumers of this country are unorganized, and have remained silent under the load which they carry, trusting that their Representatives would be watchful of their interests and endeavor to remove, gradually at least, the wrongs under which they are laboring. But if their silence on this subject is to be construed into acquiescence or submission, is not the hushed voice of the great body of the decent women of America to be regarded as in approbation of the blatant shrieks of those strong-minded and loud-mouthed aspirants for ballots and breeches who have been lounging about the corridors of the Capitol in the senseless and unsexed zeal for participation in the strifes and turmoils of a political election? They have sent no counter-petitions against the proposed innovation, which their native modesty and common sense teach them would be but "the direful spring of woes unnumbered," the entire destruction of that mighty influence which they now wield over the destinies of the human race.

"Capital is organized," and the "head center" of the Moloch of taxation, the Philadelphia Association, can and does send to all the manufacturing establishments of the country stereotyped petitions in favor of the continuation of their pet schemes for the further plunder of the great masses of the people. Because of the patient endurance of the consumers, we are told that they are satisfied with the yoke which they wear; that they require and ask no relief from their struggling condition, but desire still to dwell in the happy tents of protection. They are not satisfied. They ought not to be satisfied. They ought to and do demand that the system of taxation shall be so arranged that all its burdens shall not rest upon them, and the self-constituted patriots shall no longer suck their life-blood in order that they may fatten upon the aliment. The voice of this outraged class will yet be heard, and if "judgment be not fled to brutish beasts and men have lost their reason" the potent argument of their oppressors will be met with the cry of "free trade and farmers' rights"—the stern and powerful remonstrance of the great agricultural interest of the country, which will teach a salutary lesson to the lawgivers and statesmen "who duncely manage their affairs in parliament."

We are warned that if Congress reduces the taxes upon imports we shall have a diminution of revenue, already hardly large enough for the wants of the Treasury. This assumption is necessarily based upon the idea that the present rates are at the point of greatest production, and hence any change would injuriously affect the public interest. If this is true, we have at last reached that happy period when no proposed protection is needed for the full development of the industrial avocations of the people, but all is accomplished in a tariff whose only object is to raise funds for the support of the Government. But I apprehend there is error in the statement. A reduction of the tax, in my opinion, would increase the importations to such an extent as to make up for any loss in the amount of the import rate, especially if the people shall have the means to become purchasers. And if something of the kind is not soon done I predict that our condition will become so crippled that importations will decrease and a financial collapse will add to the distresses of the country.

The great difficulty now experienced by our manufacturers is the want of a general diffusion of money and the consequent inability of a large number of persons to purchase what their convenience and desires suggest. This decreases consumption, and the consequent market demand for their products and stagnation of trade are the necessary result. Even at the low prices which rule the values of many of them millers cannot sell, and hence there is a stoppage, either partial or entire, of their operations. An increase of the tariff even would not help the matter at all. If a more liberal and just policy should be pursued, by which discriminations so great would not be made against foreign nations, their policy would be proportionally liberalized, an active trade would soon ensue, prosperity would come to the consuming classes, and the manufacturing enterprises would participate in the general advancement. Then business confidence would revive, the revenues would increase, and we should more than ever be the creditor nation, with the mass of the people as creditors, instead, as now, of a very few whose combined means enables them to control.

As I have already said, I do not desire any damage to befall the manufacturing industries of the country. I wish that they may all meet with the fullest prosperity consistent with the maintenance of the just rights of all other business. I should be glad to see a general diversity of pursuits in all parts of the land, brought about by the healthy demands of trade and the result of the uncontrolled action of the people. But I cannot consent that their enterprise shall flourish or be maintained at the expense of other callings which are equally entitled to the recognition of the Government; and my sincere belief is that if full and impartial justice shall be done to all the conflict will cease and that harmony will be established, which will insure the success of every interest of the country.

A few more words and I shall have done. The bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means is far from effecting the radical changes in our financial system, which I regard as essential to the general welfare. But I know the difficulties with which they met. Their report shows that a majority of them are in harmony with the views of those who favor a freer and more unrestricted trade, and that they earnestly desire a nearer approach to the revenue standard, by which they believe that the great interests of the country will be more surely advanced. As a choice of evils it is my purpose to support their measure, trusting that it will demonstrate the wisdom and justice of lightening the burdens of taxation. In a few years I hope that a still more liberal policy will prevail and that out of it will flow an unending stream of prosperity and happiness to all parts and all interests of this great Republic.

BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. BICKNELL. Mr. Speaker, the people demand the repeal of the bankrupt law. None but the large traders defend it. They defend it because it gives them despotic power over the great mass of their customers who are small traders and generally men of small means. In any period of contraction and depression when the small trader becomes embarrassed in his business the threat of the wealthy and powerful creditor, "I will put you into bankruptcy," makes the former substantially his servant, destroys his independence. The law ought not to create such a power and ought not to foster it. The creditor classes need no such power; they need no peculiar privileges. The same shrewdness and rigor and prudence that made them creditors enables them to take care of themselves, and they always do so.

It has been said that the chief object of government is to protect property. That may be true of despotisms, but it is not true of modern democracy. All our costly machinery of government, our legislative bodies, our courts, our thousands of executive officers, are not established merely to defend the rich, but mainly to protect the defenseless poor man, powerless to protect himself. "To judge the people according unto right and defend the poor" will be the character of a truly democratic government forever.

I said that only the large creditors defend the bankrupt law; but there is another class who do it: the officers who take the fees. Except them, I have heard no man in my district advocate the present bankrupt law. For the last five years especially its results have been so fatal, so invariably have the assets of the bankrupt been squandered in fees and lawsuits and other expenses that few creditors pay any regard to the proceedings. They deem it useless even to prove their debts; there is nothing to be gained thereby. They throw their bankrupt notices into the fire and curse the law, and that is the end of it.

But not only has this law received the general condemnation of the people; it is wrong in principle. When the Constitution authorized Congress to make a bankrupt law bankruptcy had a specific meaning; it was not mere insolvency, it was fraudulent insolvency; there was villainy in it, not mere inability to pay debts. Lord Coke tells us "the name and the wickedness of bankruptcy were imported from foreign nations," but our bankrupt law abolishes all distinction between honest insolvency and fraudulent insolvency; puts the rogue and the honest man upon the same footing, gives them alike a discharge, the only difference being that the rogue can appropriate 50 per cent. of his creditors' property, while the honest man saves nothing. Such a law debauches and demoralizes the community; it sets at naught the moral principles that formerly upheld the sacredness of an honest debt.

Under bankruptcy, as originally defined, when a trader becomes a defrauder, a criminal, the Government comes in and administers on his estate as if he were dead; distributes it among his creditors and discharges him as if he were dead; commercially he is dead; his credit is gone; he begins de novo; if he is ever trusted again it is on the faith of a new character subsequently acquired; there is some plausibility in that; but to make a man a bankrupt for mere insolvency, failure to pay a note, is an outrage, and the wholesale discharge from debt is universal repudiation.

In voluntary bankruptcy, where a man may purchase twenty thousand dollars' worth of property and pay for half of it and keep the remainder for nothing, that is legalized robbery; it tends to overturn the foundations of social order.

You may take private property for public use, but the public must pay for it, while, under the bankrupt law, private property is taken for private use and nothing is paid for it. Every debt discharged without payment or release is so much property taken from the creditor and given to the debtor for nothing; as long as a single creditor objects to it the injury is done to him. It is no wonder that the honest farmers of the country are opposed to such a law. I mean the bone and sinew of the country, the men who own the small farms and do their own work. I have heard but one plausible argument in favor of the present bankrupt law, and that is founded on expediency only, to wit: that in this country we need a jubilee, a general discharge of debts at least once in a generation. If that be true, I submit that the present bankrupt law has fully done its work in that respect, and it is time to go back to first principles.

Our bankrupt law is not only essentially vicious in principle, but it has the bad pre-eminence of violating the rights of creditor and debtor both, and it also violates the rights of the States by annulling and making useless all their insolvent laws.

The people of the several States are not alike; they differ in their laws, in their social customs, in their habits of business, and to some extent even in their notions of right and wrong.

The several States had, and rightly had, their own insolvent laws; all laws have their origin in the social necessities of the people who make them; the insolvent laws of the States, alike in general, had specific differences, suited to the peculiar condition and circumstances and general legal system of the people who adopted them respectively; the foreign creditor who trusted citizens of any State for the sake of gain, had no right to complain that their insolvent laws were not such as he was familiar with at home; all he could justly demand was equal rights with a resident creditor under the State laws. But the bankrupt law, under pretense of regulating bankruptcy, has substantially swept away the insolvent laws of every State, and by introducing new principles gathered from English law and elsewhere, and unknown to our western communities, has unsettled the general system of mercantile business and has produced universal confusion.

Hence, although a certain class of politicians have been able three times since the year 1800 to procure the passage of a bankrupt law, yet in every instance the law has failed to satisfy the people, and has been repudiated after a very short trial. The bankrupt law of 1800 was repealed in less than two years; the law of 1841 was repealed in less than three years. The longer life of the present law can be justly ascribed to the general demoralization of the times, but the people will submit to it no longer. One of the chief objections to all these laws was that the people of the several States prefer their own systems of insolvent laws, and want no Federal officers interfering in their local domestic concerns.

But, besides interfering with various State laws regulating their internal policy, the bankrupt law, in its influence upon the private conduct and moral principles of men, has been eminently disastrous.

It has begotten and fostered a reckless disregard of debt, a spirit of extravagant and wild speculation, which sooner or later ends in complete dishonesty. It has made men familiar with the notion that obligations may be lawfully discharged otherwise than by honest labor and sacrifice of property and of personal comfort. It has destroyed that just sense of ultimate responsibility which is the best check upon hazardous undertakings, and the consequence has been a general destruction of confidence throughout the community; no man knows whom to trust; it is impossible to foresee how soon any debt may be satisfied by a bankrupt's discharge.

These disadvantages are not compensated by the establishment of an artificial uniformity of complex proceedings which few understand and nobody desires.

For the foregoing reasons, but especially because the people, who know what they want, demand the repeal of this law, it is our duty to repeal it. Let us abolish the premium for dishonesty, and restore, if we can, the old-fashioned doctrine, that an honest debt must be paid by honest labor and honest sacrifice.

THE NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, I propose in the short time I shall occupy to-night to offer some reasons why the time for the completion of the Northern Pacific Railroad should be extended in accordance with the application of that company.

This is a measure of great importance, not only to the people of Oregon but to the whole of our northwestern States and Territories, as by the passage of the bill and the successful completion of the road it is impossible to conjecture the benefits that must inevitably result to that section of our country. There is no subject of legislation which will be considered by this Congress that will so materially and directly affect their interests as will the passage of the bill extending the time for the completion of this road.

The practicability of the enterprise is conceded. The time has passed when the construction of a railroad from Lake Superior to the Pacific Ocean may be considered the idle dream of an enthusiast or adventurer. The construction and successful operation of a railroad from the Missouri River to the Golden Gate in California has effectually dispelled all such false and erroneous impressions, and demonstrated the wisdom and foresight of its projectors and of the Government in extending to it substantial aid. I will not discuss this bill and its provisions as though it were an original application of this company for a subsidy of lands out of the public domain to enable it to commence the construction of its road.

Whatever might be the merits of such an application, I know and understand too well the present temper of the public mind to ask the representatives of the people, chosen at such a time as this, to disregard it, although personally believing it to be an unwholesome prejudice to refuse to assist by legislative aid such and any and all such legitimate enterprises as assist to build up and develop our common country, give homes and remunerative employment to our people, so many of whom are now idle for want of it, besides tending to increase our commercial importance both at home and abroad. The company has a more substantial claim than would be involved in a new application.

The original charter of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company was granted by act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, by the provisions of which the company were authorized to construct its road from a point on Lake Superior to Puget Sound, in the Territory of Washington, with a branch to the city of Portland, in the State of Oregon. To assist it in doing so and for the purpose, as stated in the act, of "securing the safe and speedy transportation of the mails, munitions of war, and public stores over the route of said line of railway," a grant of the public lands was made to the company amounting to twelve thousand eight hundred acres per mile, through the States traversed by the road, and twenty-five thousand six hundred acres per mile through the Territories. By the terms of the act the road was to be completed in twelve years. By a joint resolution of Congress approved May 7, 1866, the time for the completion of the road was extended for two years longer. By a subsequent joint resolution, approved July 1, 1868, amending section eight of the original act, the time fixed for the completion and equipment of the road was again changed; though apparently conflicting with the previous joint resolution the times seem to have been shortened one year for the completion of the road. By joint resolution of Congress approved April 10, 1869, the company were authorized to extend their branch and connect the terminus thereof, which was at Portland, Oregon, to the terminus of their then main line on Puget Sound, upon the terms and conditions, and with the rights and privileges conferred upon the company by the original act of incorporation and all additional acts amendatory thereof.

By joint resolution of Congress approved May 31, 1870, that which had theretofore been known as the branch line was made the main line, since which time it has been located down the Columbia River Valley and to Puget Sound, and a portion thereof has been constructed. By the latter joint resolution the railroad company was authorized "to issue bonds to aid in the construction and equipment of its road, and secure the same by mortgage on its property and rights of property of all kinds and descriptions, real, personal, and mixed, including its franchise as a corporation."

The company claim that the time for the completion of its road under the various acts and resolutions above referred to does not expire until July 4, 1879. The Commissioner of the General Land Office has adopted the view of the company in this respect, and has not reported this company as among those whose grants have lapsed by the expiration of the time for the completion of the road, leaving the company at this time in full possession of its rights under the grant, free to continue the construction of its road, with the right to receive a title to the newly earned portions of its grant unimpaired.

The company, prior to the time of its failure, constructed and equipped, in its eastern division, four hundred and fifty miles of its road, from Lake Superior west to Bismarck, in Dakota Territory, and in its western division, from Puget Sound to the Columbia River, one hundred and five miles.

In April, 1875, the company being then delinquent in the payment of its interest, legal proceedings were instituted by the holders of its bonds to foreclose their mortgage upon the road and property of the company; a decree was obtained under which the property and rights of the company, including its franchise to be a corporation, were sold and are now claimed and held by the persons who furnished the capital by which the enterprise was carried forward until the failure of the company. Since the sale under the decree of foreclosure the company has been reorganized completely and being now in full possession of the road, property, and franchises of the old company applies by petition to Congress for an extension of the time for the completion of the road, in accordance with the spirit of the original act of incorporation.

In the petition of the company presented to this House on the 6th day of December, 1877, for the purpose of obtaining an extension of time, I find this statement:

That since said reorganization and in the present year 1877 your petitioner has constructed and equipped and completed in all respects, as required by law, more than thirty miles of its branch road in Washington Territory, and has commenced the work of construction of the main line west of Bismarck, in Dakota Territory, and the same is now in progress; and it is the intention of your petitioner to proceed with said work as rapidly as a prudent use of means will permit, and to construct, equip, and complete the entire road and branch within such reasonable and sufficient time as Congress shall specify for that purpose.

At the first session of the present Congress a bill providing for an extension of the time to this company, in accordance with its petition, was introduced and referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

The committee have reported the bill recommending the extension of the time, and with several important amendments to which I will briefly refer. After confirming to the company the rights, privileges, and property as now claimed by it, it is required to complete one hundred miles of its main line per year, twenty-five miles of which shall be west of the Rocky Mountains. As has been before remarked, double the amount of land was given to the company where the line of their road is located in the Territories; under this provision of the act the company located its line of road in its western division, entirely on the north side of the Columbia River in the Territory of Washington. In the bill as amended, and reported by the committee with the knowledge, approval, and consent of the company, they are required to locate and construct so much of their line of road as lies between the city of Portland and the town of Umatilla, in the State of Oregon, on the south side of the river, thus changing the location of the road for a distance of over two hundred miles into the State of Oregon. This the company have done as a concession to the wants and requirements of the people of that State.

By this amendment they will have to abandon, for the distance above referred to, of the change of location, one-half their land grant, thereby restoring to the public domain about twenty-five hundred thousand acres of land. The bill has been further amended in the committee by requiring the company to sell its lands obtained under the grant to actual settlers at the same price and upon the same terms and conditions as the lands of the Government lying within the limits of the grant are sold. This amendment will remove a great obstacle to settlement on the public lands heretofore felt by persons settling upon railroad lands and those going upon new and unsettled public lands lying within the grant in advance of the Government surveys, by enabling them to obtain title to the land settled upon without embarrassment and at a reasonable and certain price. There is a further amendment, protecting private entries, homestead and pre-emption claimants whose rights attached prior to the receipt of the orders of withdrawal at the respective district land offices, and relieving all suspended claims on account of an increased price of the even sections within the grant by permitting the same to be carried into patent.

The bill was also amended in the committee by repealing the branch grant in Washington Territory by which the company will have to abandon over five million acres of land heretofore claimed by them. The company was further authorized, on the vote of two-thirds of the stockholders present at a meeting called for that purpose, to issue its bonds for the construction and equipment of its road, not to exceed $25,000 per mile, and to secure the same by mortgage.

It is further provided that, if the company fail to construct the road and earn the lands, the settlers thereon may obtain titles under the homestead and pre-emption laws as if this grant had not been made. The bill contains the most liberal provision for settlers contained in any grant of the kind; and the committee have used commendable diligence and judgment in surrounding them with every possible guarantee for their future security. The following sections are important and unusual in such grants: the seventh section of the amended bill declares the duty of the company to maintain at all times its road and telegraph line in good repair, and gives the Government the preference in the use thereof for specified purposes at reasonable rates, and authorizes the President, for willful neglect of the company to "transport promptly the mails, munitions of war, supplies, and public stores," to take possession of the railroad and telegraph line and their equipments and use the same to perform the required service. The eighth section provides that when the company shall sell or contract to sell or shall convey away any of the lands granted the same shall be subject to taxation in any State or Territory. The ninth section reserves the right to Congress to at any time "add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act, or the charter or resolutions" creating the corporation, and to "provide by law against unjust discriminations and excessive charges wherever the same shall be made by the company."

The advantage of these several amendments to the people living along the line of the road, to the Government and to the stockholders is obvious.

Other amendments were submitted by myself and other persons representing different localities and interests, but they have failed to receive the approval of the committee. I shall not antagonize the report of the committee for this reason.

The Senate bill which was this day laid upon our table contains substantially all of the provisions of the bill which I am now discussing, with many important additional provisions in which I concur, and I doubt not they will when the bill is reached be incorporated into the bill and will receive the assent of the committee and the House, as I understand they have of the company.

The present stockholders of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company became the creditors of the original company at the commencement of its active operations in the construction of the road. Having then confidence in its business management they advanced the money by which its operations were carried forward, believing that the completion and operation of the road would prove a remunerative investment, yielding them back not only the principal advanced but a reasonable interest thereon. This belief was the result in some measure, as was the lending of their money to the company, of the passage of the several acts of Congress making this munificent grant of land to the company. These creditors trusted the company with their money with as much expectation and confidence that the road would be prosecuted to completion as had Congress in making the grant which induced the commencement of the work.

The grant to the company created a credit for it, and the confidence of the creditors thus inspired they had a good and valid reason to hope and believe that the company would complete the road, earn and own the land, and that both the road and land would ultimately constitute a fund out of which their money would be repaid; and I respectfully submit that these persons should not be disappointed by any act of the Government in refusing this extension of the time for the completion of the road, especially now that they have had to take, in payment for their investment made in good faith, the property and effects of the unsuccessful venture of their debtors, the original projectors of the enterprise. No subsidy or Government aid of any kind is asked. Not a dollar of the public money. Neither a guarantee of principal or interest. It is simply asked that the time be extended, even by a surrender of a large portion of the grant and an increased obligation on the part of the company; that the time lost by the reverses of the company, so common within the last period to so much of the business of our country, reverses for which the present stockholders of the company are in no wise responsible, and which brought them to the ownership of the road, be extended, that they may, by further effort and expenditure, advance the present value of their property and accomplish the purpose for which the company was originally organized.

It is but an act of justice to these persons that this time should be extended, as by no possibility can the company hope to complete the road within the present limit of time, by their own construction of the law; especially is this so as the embarrassment of the old company was due in a great measure to the lamentable financial crisis in the country, against which the most prudent and thrifty have struggled heroically. The present owners of this road should not now be left with this great national enterprise on their hands incomplete; but they should be reassured in their just and reasonable expectations, by having this extension granted, so as to enable them to accomplish the object of the Government in encouraging the commencement of the enterprise and to realize their own expectations in the completion of the road.

I regard this land grant as a trust fund in the hands of the Government, set apart for the completion of this road, and not only is it an act of justice to the present owners, that this fund should be kept sacred, intact, and devoted to that purpose only, but common honesty demands that the thousands of persons who have left comfortable homes, business, and friends, and in good faith gone into the western wilderness to reclaim it from the possession of the Indians and to establish there the institutions of civilization, upon the expectation, created by the Government in making this grant, that the road would be constructed, should not be disappointed.

These settlers and frontiersmen, in doing as they have done, and if this time is extended will continue to do, render a service to the Government, civilization, and the country which is seldom if ever adequately rewarded. They went there with the most implicit confidence and belief that this road would be constructed; it was one of the leading if not the only inducement for them to go, and surely this Government, which is proverbial for its liberality and magnanimity will not now disappoint them by refusing this extension of time to complete the road. Besides, in the event of refusal on the part of the Government to grant this extension they will be greatly if not irreparably injured by being left to live there after having expended their means upon unprofitable homes, without proper mail facilities and often without adequate protection and the indispensable means of transportation which the railroad if completed would afford. So important do I regard the duty of the Government to this class of its citizens, that, rather than they should be so disappointed and injured, the Government should do toward the construction of the road "any and all acts and things which may be needful and necessary to insure a speedy completion of said road," as it reserved the right in the original charter of this company to do on the failure of the company to perform the conditions thereof for a period of one year.

The advancement of the public service, the protection of the frontier, the settlement of the vast country traversed by this road, which were the primary reasons for the making of this grant, still remain to be accomplished.

The question is suggested as to what guarantee there is that this road will be completed, even if the time is extended for that purpose, as prayed for by the company. I freely admit that the time should not be extended, and the portion of the public domain applicable to this land grant should not be again tied up in the hands of this company for speculative purposes or without reasonable assurance that the road could and would be completed at the earliest day possible; certainly within the time specified in this act. It is the dictate of prudence to guard the public interest in this respect. We should look not only to the promises of the company after one failure, but we should also look after other reasonably satisfactory evidence of the intention and ability of the company to perform the work. By reference to the report of the Secretary of the Interior for the year 1877, on pages 26 and 27, I find the following statement concerning the reorganization of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, its property, and its present financial condition, as compiled by him from their annual report:

The Northern Pacific Railroad Company was reorganized on the 29th of September, 1875, under a plan which had been adopted by the holders of the company's bonds, and under which the company's mortgage was foreclosed. On the 12th of August preceding all the company's property and franchises were sold under a decree of the United States district court for the southern district of New York, and purchased by a committee of the bondholders for the account of all the holders of the company's bonds and stock, pursuant to the provisions of said plan. This plan of reorganization, approved and confirmed by the said district court, provided for the conversion of the outstanding bonds of the company into "preferred stock" and its stock into "common stock." Up to June 30, 1877, there had been issued of preferred stock to bondholders who had surrendered their bonds for conversion, and also in settlement of claims and salaries, the amount of $36,609,345.95. Of common stock there had been issued to the same date 139,453 shares, of $100 each. The company is operating four hundred and fifty miles of its road from Duluth, at the west end of Lake Superior, to Bismarck; one hundred and five miles from Kalama to Tacoma, Washington Territory; and seventeen miles from Tacoma toward Wilkeson, thirty-one miles from Tacoma, to which point it was expected that the road would be finished by the 30th of October; and which, the president of the company informs me, is now completed.

The road is definitely located from the mouth of Heart River, on the Missouri, to the mouth of Glendive Creek, on the Yellowstone, a distance of two hundred and five miles. Between the last-named point and the junction of the Deer Lodge and Little Blackfoot Rivers, Montana Territory, the line has not been definitely fixed, though it will probably follow the Yellowstone as far as the mouth of Porcupine Creek, a distance of two hundred miles from the mouth of Glendive Creek. In Washington Territory the branch and main line both terminate at Tacoma, on Puget Sound. The cost of surveys during the year ending 30th June last, was $11,785, making the total cost of surveys, $1,124,728.55. This includes the purchase of the right of way. The amount received from transportation of passengers for the year ending 30th June, 1877, was $283,915.78; of freight, $663,205.05; from miscellaneous sources, $63,930.60; total, $1,011,042.43. The operating expenses for the year were $477,451.40; leaving net earnings, $533,596.03. The total cost of construction and equipment of the road to that date was $19,421,977.56. The company's indebtedness to said date was $309,730.81. As an offset to this debt the company had bills receivable, balances due from other railroad and transportation companies, and from the United States, $229,100.54, leaving a net indebtedness of $80,630.27.

Thus it will be seen the company is out of debt and owns five hundred and eighty-six miles of road, costing $19,421,947, well equipped, yielding a net annual revenue of over $300,000, besides its earned portion of the land grant unsold lying contiguous to the completed sections of the road, with a certain prospective increase of business sufficient to pay the interest on the cost of completing the road between Bismarck and Kalama, a distance of about fifteen hundred miles, an increase of business not only sufficient to pay the interest on the cost of the incomplete portion of the road but sufficient to yield a handsome profit besides, if we may rely upon the published dividends of the only railroad to the Pacific coast. Certainly all this affords some guarantee of the good faith of the application for the extension of time and of the intention and ability of the company to complete the road.

Permit me briefly to call attention to some of the advantages that have already accrued and will continue to accrue from the construction of this road. I know there is a growing apprehension of danger in the public mind from the existence and growing power of the great corporations; and for fear of evil results many hesitate to either create them, or give aid to them from the public fund. I assume, without at this time giving my reasons therefor, that Congress may do both in the legitimate exercise of its constitutional power for any of the purposes mentioned in the law relating to this company. Speaking upon this subject, the committee say in their report upon the Texas and Pacific bill:

To hold that the Government cannot combine with private capital, retaining its general control over the work when completed, and to call to its aid individual enterprise and energy in securing a great national highway deemed essential to its interest and the security and prosperity of the country, would be to deny to the Government the employment of what it might conceive to be the cheapest, most expeditious and most efficacious means of accomplishing an object clearly and confessedly within the limits of its constitutional power.

No danger need be apprehended if in such legislation the public interests are carefully guarded. The great unanimity with which this House to-day in its action upon the Union and Central Pacific funding bill declared not only its power to protect the public interests but its disposition to do so will allay any apprehension of harm from this source in the public mind.

After thorough examination of the bill I must commend the wisdom of the committee for the careful manner in which they have guarded every interest of the Government, reserving to Congress, as they have done, full power to hereafter control the conduct of the company in many important respects in which that power has been heretofore disputed. Every authority conferred upon the company is properly hedged about with wholesome restrictions.

When this company commenced the construction of this road the region of country from Lake Superior to the Rocky Mountains was a wilderness entirely beyond the confines of civilization. A distinguished member of this House taxed his ingenuity in vain to ascertain the exact locality of the great city destined to be the eastern terminus of the road. What was the value of the public land granted to the company for the purpose of aiding in the construction of the road at that time? It had no market value, for there was neither a market nor demand for it, nor would not have been yet if the road had not been built. It could neither be profitably nor even safely occupied by the settler for any of the purposes contemplated by the public-land laws. The Indians who roamed over it were kept in subjection at great annual expense to the Government; even the surveyors of the company in locating the line of the road had to be protected by Government troops. How is it now and what has produced this result? A happy and prosperous population adorns with comfortable homes and improved farms the line of the road from Duluth to Bismarck, all of whom have gone there as a result of the construction of this road and many by reason of special inducements offered by the company. Life and property are as secure there as elsewhere. Territorial, county organizations, and courts are in perfect operation. The soldier and savage have alike given place for the plow, the work-shop, the church, and the school-house. On the line of the road the Government has three land offices at which within the limits of the grant during the last fiscal year it disposed of for settlement over three hundred thousand acres of land under the various acts for the disposition of the public lands. Equally great progress has been made in its Pacific division.

In contemplation of the passage of this bill and the early resumption of work on this road, there have been already this year over one thousand applications for lands for actual settlement made to the company in Washington and Idaho Territories. Where Chief Joseph wrought his murderous work within a year upon the settlers who had gone into that country expecting this road to be built, now settlements are being made with wonderful rapidity. That war would not have occurred had this road been completed, and its construction is a future perpetual guarantee against the recurrence of such wars upon our entire Northwestern frontier.

By a proper extension of our railway system upon our northern and southern border we secure our territory against any possible encroachment or raids from persons such as are now menacing our citizens upon either boundary.

The company sold land earned by the construction of this road, principally, however, in settlement of its indebtedness, for which it received $1,695,714.46 between October 1, 1875, and July 31, 1877. The wheat crop on its eastern division last year was fifteen hundred thousand bushels. In the Pacific division an equal quantity was produced for foreign shipment within the limits of this grant.

The necessity declared by past legislation for additional competing transcontinental lines of railway is affirmed by the committee having our railway interests directly in charge, and yet the possibility of the destruction of competition by the southernmost of the contemplated lines is by their report admitted from the over-reaching cupid-ity of the giant monopoly now levying tribute by excessive charges upon the entire commerce of our Pacific States and Territories. The whole Pacific coast will be immeasurably benefited by destroying the monopolies that embarrass transportation there. This the competition of this road will do if it is completed. The purely local business upon either road from this cause will not be materially benefited, as the distance between them is so great and there are no connecting lines, but the large and increasing through trade from one coast to the other must be done at greatly reduced prices as the result of competition. This road should be constructed and maintained as an independent line, free as the interest of the company and its patrons shall demand to compete for its business, that it may prove what it is intended to be, a benefit and not injury to the people of the Northwestern States and Territories. In this view it deserves not only the support and encouragement of the nation but of every local interest. It should be, as it is, forbidden to combine its business interests with other companies, thus defeating competitive transportation, which is the interest of both the Government and the people.

No section needs more the advantage of competition and increased facilities for transportation than Oregon, Washington, and Idaho. In addition to being heavily taxed with high charges by local companies and increased insurance, its commerce is laid under tribute to swell the large annual revenues of the two companies now holding a monopoly of the only means by which communication can be had with eastern cities, from which, as manufacturing there are yet in their infancy, supplies for that section are largely drawn.

Cheap transportation to the seaboard is a necessity to an early and proper development of the great interior region lying between our Atlantic and Pacific States. In the present condition of this section of country private enterprise alone is insufficient for this purpose. Yet when roads are constructed under the fostering care of the Government, with the rapid settlement and development of the country which follows immediately they will be able to make for themselves a business not only self-supporting, but remunerative. Our transportation, agricultural, and mining interests should be guarded and protected by legislation with the same care bestowed upon our manufactures. Our commerce with other countries and our ship-building interests upon the Pacific are to be largely augmented by the construction of this road.

Increased facilities and competition, besides stimulating a landable rivalry in business, must give reduced prices and improved accommodations. While drawing nothing from the public Treasury, the construction of this road affords a well-defined method of reducing our standing army and the current expenses of the Government, besides building up prosperous communities upon new territory, adding largely to its revenues and to our surplus productions, and relieving the people from a grasping and oppressive monopoly; and in its practical working will develop and demonstrate that commercial law of supply and demand which would otherwise have to be accomplished imperfectly by congressional legislation.

THE NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, the Northern Pacific Railroad Company was created by act of Congress, approved July 2, 1864. The company did not commence the work of actual construction until nearly six years afterward. An excuse for this long delay is to be found in the magnitude of the enterprise, the extent and expense of the necessary preliminary surveys, and the enormous sum of money involved in the construction and completion of the road. While the grant of land was liberal—every alternate section for twenty miles on each side of the road where its line ran through a State, and double the quantity where its line ran through the Territories—yet that land could not be made available, to any considerable extent, in the construction of the road. No subsidy in money, in any shape, was either asked or granted. It was a national enterprise, to be consummated by private means. Its paramount object and all its grander results are national; but the funds necessary for the accomplishment of this object and to secure these results are private.

The work of construction was commenced in earnest in 1870, at both ends of the line, and pushed with commendable vigor until the financial crash in 1873. That crash stopped the sale of the bonds of the company and carried Jay Cooke & Co., their bankers, into bankruptcy. In the mean time over five hundred miles of the road had been built and fully equipped.

It is manifest from this brief résumé and from current history that the company was not to blame for this sudden stoppage; but the times were out of joint and money could not be obtained for carrying on the work. The suspension of railroad building was general and not confined to this company alone.

The temporary suspension of this enterprise was a national misfortune, for it left unaccomplished the purposes had in view by its creation, while the reasons that prompted it remained as urgent and potent as ever. While their fault, if any, did not contribute to its suspension, to refuse them an extension of time now, after they have regained their feet and are ready to go on, and have given convincing evidence of their ability to go on by the construction of over one hundred miles of road in the past year, is like plundering a man because he is down.

The company are not asking a subsidy, but a mere extension of time in which to complete their road. They are in the condition of a mortgagor who has made default in payment, they are liable to a suit for foreclosure. A generous and judicious mortgagee, if he saw a disposition and ability to pay in the near future, would certainly extend the time for payment.

The land grant, while it is to some extent the basis for present credit, and is of ultimate value to the company, is no loss to the Government. The price charged by the Government for its lands is $1.25 per acre; the moiety of land retained by the Government within the limit of this grant is raised to $2.50 per acre. In other words, the one-half retained is to the Government of the same value as the whole would be without the road. Besides, the construction of the road secures the settlement of the public domain, the speedy development of its resources, the increase of material wealth, swells the vol-time of taxable property, and opens up a broad highway for domestic and foreign trade and commerce.

This bill with the provisions for the surrendering of certain of the granted lands brings back the enterprise to its original design and purpose, a single transcontinental northern line connecting the great lakes with the Pacific Ocean. It restores to the public domain in Washington Territory all of the branch lands, amounting in the aggregate to over eight million acres, and on the main line, by reason of its change of route to the south side of the Columbia River, two millions and a quarter of acres more. This may be considered as a consideration for this extension of time. This bill in its provisions is far more liberal in its recognition of the rights of settlers than is the original charter. I believe it could safely have gone further in the recognition and confirmation of such rights, but I am not inclined to reject what it gives because I could not obtain more from the committee. All legislation is to some extent a compromise of conflicting claims and rights, and I accept the provisions of this bill as the best I could obtain.

Its provisions are liberal as compared with the vicious constructions of the past. Anything is preferable to the present condition of things. It would be a misfortune to defeat this bill and to rest there. The grant to this company is what lawyers call a grant in presenti; the title to the land is vested in the company. Mere non-performance of the conditions of the grant does not divest the company of their rights under it, nor restore the land to the public domain. There must be a legislative declaration of forfeiture or some governmental act equivalent thereto. Hence, unless this Congress is willing to go further than mere negative action, the effect will be to continue all the lands on the branch as well as on the main line in the possession and ownership of the company. Hence I say the defeat of this bill would be a misfortune unless Congress is prepared to assume the aggressive, and to declare this land grant forfeited for the non-performance of conditions subsequent.

But why should a forfeiture be declared under the facts of this case? The reasons which prompted this grant are as potential now as ever. This road cannot and will not be constructed without the aid of this land grant as a basis of credit.

One reason for the continuance of this grant of land and extension of time for the completion of the road is by its construction to settle the Indian question forever. There is a vast amount of human nature in the Indian. He believes that the Great Spirit is on the side of the heavy battalions; he respects power; he worships power; the name of his deity all over the Northwest is Sock-la-tie, or "The God of Power." While he has no virtue but bravery, and no vice but cowardice, his deity has no attribute but power.

He not only respects power, but his respect for power is heightened by its present and immediate effectiveness. Distant power has no terrors for him. A living, menacing, present force is what he fears and obeys. Present victory with its opportunities for immediate plunder is so sweet that he chooses it at the price of distant though ultimate defeat. To hold him, therefore, in subjection the force must be palpable and impending. He of all beings lives in the present and on the fruits of the present. He is reckless of the morrow and its results, whether they be victory or defeat. This disposition is what makes him a scourge to the pioneer and is an almost impassable barrier to his civilization. He cannot wait for future results; hence he never sows, because reaping is too distant. To him the facts of the present are the only factors of life; they are all that he knows, all he heeds.

The railroad and locomotive are to him the highest symbols of power. He understands the quickness with which forces can be concentrated along the line of the road, and hence the theater of his hostility is not there. There have been no Indian wars along the line of the Union or Central Pacific since they were constructed. The line of the Northern Pacific is through the country where dwell the most powerful and warlike tribes of Indians on this continent. Let this road be built, and all probability of danger from that source is forever past.

As I have said before, the Government really loses nothing by the land grant; it is in the condition of the proprietor of a town who gives away every alternate town lot on the condition that it shall be improved upon. By this means he increases both population and wealth, accelerates the growth of his town, and more than doubles the value of his remaining property. The Government gets the same sum of money for the half that it otherwise would for the whole; and besides it saves every year millions of dollars that would otherwise be necessarily expended for the suppression or prevention of Indian hostilities.

But the benefit to be derived is not in dollars and cents alone; human life is preserved; women and children are saved from horrid massacre; and brave men live for nobler deeds of valor. Had this railroad been built within the time prescribed by the existing law the noble Cuater and his brave band of heroic men would not now be sleeping the sleep of death on the wild slopes of the Rosebud Creek; nor would the Nez Percé "Joseph" and his band of Indians have made a trail marked with conflagration and death for nearly a thousand miles in length.

Again, another object had in view by the statesmen who first gave form and substance to this enterprise was to open up to settlement the vast domain lying between the lakes and Puget Sound, most of it at that time a vast wilderness. This immense country is not only rich in mines of coal, iron, cinnabar, gold, and silver, needing but population and industry to develop them, but it is the great wheat belt of this continent. This rich slope of country stretching between the Rocky Mountains and the Mississippi is the foundation of strong and populous commonwealths yet to be. Their growth will be hastened by the completion or delayed by the defeat of this railroad. Without it their growth will be slow indeed.

The Government will receive its compensation for the donation of these lands and the extension of the time for the completion of the road, in the increase of population and material wealth; in the swelling of the volume of business; in the consumption of dutiable articles; and in the manufacture and use of the articles on which internal revenue is collected. Would it not be best and wisest to hasten the settlement of this country by the continuance of the land grants to the company, even though the Government should lose the price of the land, rather than to lose that constantly increasing and perpetual revenue which would be paid by a large and ever-growing population?

The line of the road crosses the Rocky Mountains at an elevation of not over five thousand feet. It descends the western slope of these mountains with an easy grade until it reaches the valley of the Columbia, and from thence on and down that valley to Portland and the Sound with no greater grade than that of flowing water. The sum of its elevations is about three times less than that of the Union and Central Pacific Road.

From the Rocky Mountains westward to The Dalles, in Oregon, at the eastern base of the Cascade range, the road will run through the center of the great Columbia River basin. This basin is fully six hundred miles in length by four hundred miles in width. It was once, no doubt, an immense inland sea. Beds of petrified oysters and other marine shells attest this fact. Indian tradition also corroborates it.

The soil of this basin is very largely composed of volcanic ash and carbonate of lime, much the same as the island of Sicily. All the elements necessary for the successful production of wheat and other cereals exist in inexhaustible quantities in the soil. In this regard its capabilities are sublimely great.

Continue this grant by the extension of time to the Northern Pacific, and thus secure the construction of this road, and in a quarter of a century this basin will be filled with many thousands of industrious and thrifty people who will send their surplus millions of grain to the markets of the world. The customs dues and internal-revenue tax which they will pay will be far more valuable to the Government than the revenue derived from the slow sale of the public lands.

Population is what is wanted; the wealth arising from the productive energies of labor is what enriches a country and makes it both strong and powerful, while land not made productive by labor enriches nobody. Hence Government gives away its domain to actual settlers on the lands, and this is done to encourage settlement and to increase the products of labor and thus to augment the material wealth of the country. It is the same principle which underlies the grant to this company; it is a sound principle, and care should be taken that the grant accomplishes this object, the settlement of the country. Hence I contend and have always contended, that the grantee should be limited in the price he could ask, and that he should be compelled to sell when that price was tendered; and I am sorry that this bill does not fully recognize this principle, for then it would be in full harmony with the liberal and settled policy of the Government in the disposition of its lands. It is always difficult at a single bound to reach ultimates; they must be approached by degrees. This bill, in its provisions upon this subject, is a long step in the right direction.

In this connection there is another proposed provision to which I wish to invite special attention. The bill submitted by the House committee, as well as by the Senate committee, and accepted in this regard by the company, make the main line of the road run down the south side of the Columbia River and permit the company to commence the construction of the road between Umatilla, Oregon, and the mouth of Snake River, in Washington Territory, and thence proceed eastward. It is well known to every man at all acquainted with this great river that the falls or rapids at The Dalles and lower down at the Cascades completely interrupt its continuous navigation. These out of the way and the navigation for good-sized steamers extends between five and six hundred miles beyond.

The men or company controlling the portages around the rapids have virtually and actually control of the navigation of that immense river and the large and constantly increasing commerce of the great Columbia River basin. The Oregon Steam Navigation Company now control these portages and have controlled them for years. The freight charges are very low now as compared to what they have been in former years. Yet now the freight charge is $25 per ton from Portland to Wallula, a distance of about two hundred and twenty miles. If the railroad company commence the construction of the road at Umatilla or near the mouth of Snake River, and thence build eastward, it leaves the Lower Columbia locked with the keys still in the possession of the Oregon Steam Navigation Company, and this state of things must, unless this bill is amended, be continued for ten years more.

The possession of power which may be wielded to the detriment of the public and for the pecuniary aggrandizement of its possessor is a dangerous lodgment for the rights and interests of the people. Corporations are no more fit guardians for the interests of the public than wolves are fit guardians of lambs. The result is always the same in each case—both are devoured.

It is in the power of Congress to remedy this evil, and a fit opportunity for the exercise of this power is now presented. Compel this railroad company in a reasonable time, say three years, to build portages around the rapids of the Cascades and The Dalles. Let them be free for all at reasonable charges, and the present monopoly is broken. It is no injustice to the railroad company to compel them to build these portages. It is in furtherance of their designs on the direct line of their route, and fifteen miles of road is all that is necessary. They must ultimately build this very road before Portland can be reached.

The railroad company assert that there is no combination between them and the Oregon Steam Navigation Company. I accept their disclaimer as true. Such being the case, nothing is more manifest than that it is the interest of the railroad company to build these portages at once. The iron and other material necessary for the construction of the four hundred miles of road beyond must pass over these portages. More than enough would be saved in the freight on iron alone to build them. The railroad company must either build the road or pay the enormous freight or else make special rates with the Oregon Steam Navigation Company. If special rates are granted they will be granted as a consideration for not building and for the continuance of this crushing monopoly. The interests of the sixty thousand people now living on the Upper Columbia and its affluents, a vast and productive basin into which a constantly increasing volume of immigration is pouring, ought not to be left dependent upon the option of the railroad company, but ought to be secured by law. Said company can no doubt secure cheap rates for its iron and other freights by contract, but an essential element of that contract, either express or implied, will be a denial of the same rates to others.

Congress is the guardian of the rights of the people, and when its equity powers are appealed to to continue a lapsed grant it ought to compel those to whom its generosity is extended to do equity, and not to leave it to the option of the donees of its generosity whether they will do equity or not.

Finally, there is another fact which ought always to be kept in view in connection with this enterprise. Time and distance are the great factors in the commerce of the world, both domestic and foreign. The saving of distance, other things being equal, is the saving of time, and hence the saving of cost. The distance from Puget Sound to the principal ports of China or Japan is from six to eight hundred miles shorter than from San Francisco or any other terminus of a transcontinental line of railroad. I think the saving is about one-fourth of the whole distance, but the exact proportion is not material. If the above estimate as to the proportion be correct, the immense saving in cost of transportation by vessels is manifest. One-fourth less marine tonnage would be necessary for the ocean carrying trade, and there could and would, under the law of competition, be a vast saving and deduction in the cost of transportation. This would necessarily cheapen the cost of articles of foreign production, and, as a consequence, increase their consumption, and thus swell the volume of customs revenue. Not only this, but our exports would be correspondingly increased.

I would be glad to elaborate this topic further, but time will not permit me. I hope, therefore, that this bill may pass.

CLAIMS AND WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. HANNA. Mr. Speaker, the subject of claims and war claims and the remedy for special legislation, it seems to me, is worthy of serious consideration. I propose to briefly call attention to what seems to me a prolific source of public corruption, one which, unless speedily remedied will surely sap the life of the Republic. I allude to the enormous and alarming proportions in number, amount, and character of the so-called private relief bills. It would seem to the critical observer that the American Congress, instead of convening for the consideration of great questions of public interest involving the general welfare of the nation, has degenerated into a mere conclave of claim agents; that the Representative as to each claim in which a constituent alleges an interest must act the part of judge, juror, advocate, and witness to such an extent that the vocation has become a disgusting feature of Congressional life. Since this Congress assembled, more than forty-four hundred bills have been introduced and printed at the expense of the people, and an examination of the files discloses the startling fact that the number, if considered either in committee or by the House, which are in part or in the nature of bills for private relief, claims or alleged claims of some sort, ancient or modern, fictitious or real, speculative or meritorious, is sufficient to swamp all consideration of general legislation. As a rule, these claims sound in damages to the people and the depletion of the Treasury. Observe, if you please, the unavoidably demoralizing effect of this species of legislation. A member, I care not how pure, honest, or patriotic he may be, introduces one or more bills of this character. He naturally regards the measure as his bantling. It receives his faithful attention and fostering care. The interested constituent from time to time not only reminds him that the bill is still pending, but appeals for earnest and efficient effort in its behalf. The feeling of the member becomes enlisted. He visits the committee-room, interviews the subcommittee, perchance appeals to the full committee, in short, labors as earnestly for a favorable report as though he were an attorney prosecuting or defending for client a cause in court. If the report be favorable, then with what vigilance he watches and presses the favorable consideration of the measure in the House. An objection from a brother member is easily tortured into an act of discourtesy, and soon, imperceptibly it may be to ourselves, we are transformed into the character of a miserable claim agent, plying a vocation we would scorn to follow at our respective homes. True, the member may not receive any pecuniary consideration for this service other than the salary paid him as such, nevertheless I aver the practice is demoralizing and degrading. Our theory of government is at war with the idea that the legislative department should assume to act in a dual character—legislative and judicial in matters of such vital concern, and especially as the evidence upon which we are required to act is in a great measure ex parte and furnished to hand by parties in interest. Sir, we approach Friday or private-bill day with hearts foreboding evil results and breathe freer when the Speaker announces the "House stands adjourned" until the noon of to-morrow. The practice of individuals resorting to Congress for legislative relief is a most pernicious one and can be in a great measure and should be speedily and effectually remedied. Wherever and whenever private or special legislation is tolerated the carrion crows of the lobby congregate to fatten and fatten upon the ill-gotten gains which too frequently by doubtful or tortuous means are filched from the people's Treasury. Bitter, blighting experience in this regard has taught many of the States the absolute necessity of prohibiting by constitutional provisions the passage of private or special acts and requiring the enactment of general laws under which by means of competent legal tribunals proper relief in all meritorious cases can be promptly administered. Examine if you will the constitutions of the several States of the Union and you will find some one of the following provisions: "No special or local law shall be enacted for the benefit of individuals or corporations in cases which are or can be provided for by a general law." "The General Assembly shall pass general laws under which local and private interests shall be provided for and protected." "In all cases where a general law can be made applicable no special law shall be enacted." "All laws shall be general and of uniform operation throughout the State." "The Legislature shall not audit nor allow any private claim or account." The time has come when the Congress of the United States may not defer longer to profit by the wisdom embodied in these provisions of our State constitutions and thereby avoid the ills to which the people of the States were subjected by the curse of special legislation. We owe it to ourselves, and much more we owe it to the people, to provide by law a barrier against this fearful inundation of private bills which submerge proper consideration of important and general interests.

Take, for illustration, that class of bills which are referred to the Committee on Claims, not war claims, but bills for the relief of parties having or desiring to have demands against the Government for moneys alleged to be due. The idea of a committee of lawyers, upon ex parte statements, attempting to mete out equal and exact justice between the Government and the claimant is simply preposterous. As a rule, either the one or the other will be wronged, and I very much fear the Government is most likely to be the victim. I submit, first, that stringent limitation laws, laws fixing a reasonable time within which claims of every character against the Government shall be presented, should be enacted, and that those laws, when once enacted, should be rigidly enforced and referred to as a rule upon every Department of the Government. When such laws, general in their application, are once enacted, let it be understood that no exceptional case can be made by subsequent legislation, but that when an alleged claim is once barred it is at an end forever without the hope of resurrection. I submit, further, that, instead of Congress attempting, by the passage of a multitude of private bills, to relieve innumerable claimants, legal tribunals of competent jurisdiction be created, whose duty it shall be to hear, try, and determine these claims upon legal evidence introduced for and against them, that the Government as well as the claimant may have a fair, full, and impartial hearing, to the end that the judgment rendered may be right. There are hundreds of bills now pending before the Committee of Claims and also before many other committees which are really in the nature of bills for private relief, that should never be disposed of by legislative enactment. Their merits should be adjudicated by a competent court according to the rules of law. And it is worse than a mockery of public justice to attempt to adjust and settle them by the passage of private relief bills. As to some matters we now have limitation laws, but the general subject should be thoroughly considered and broad, comprehensive, and effective provisions should be enacted in this regard, and then enforced in all coming time to the letter.

These statutes of repose are regarded by our system of jurisprudence with favor, and it is to them that the people of the United States must hereafter look as one of the means of self-protection. Such statutes, in connection with the creation of a tribunal for the consideration of all claims not barred by existing law, will prove of great service as a relief to the legislative department of the Government. Again, while I recognize the existing rule that the statute of limitation does not run against the sovereign, nevertheless I submit that it would be better for the interests of the people that the Government also subject herself to a rule of limitation also. It would stimulate vigilance, insure prompt settlement of the accounts of all officials, and promptly visit upon all wrong-doers the penalties of the law. Stale claims, either against the Government or in her favor, should not be tolerated or regarded with favor. After the lapse of a given number of years the attempt of the Government to collect a claim is subject to the insolvency of the debtor and increased expense, and as a rule but little is realized. The law should absolutely require all actions to be commenced against principals as well as sureties within a given period, and in case of failure on the part of the Government to thus assert her right the same law should interpose as a quietus of all liability. The rigid enforcement of such a rule would insure the collection of a larger amount and of a greater proportion of the claims due the Government than the policy which has hitherto been practiced. I trust the Judiciary Committee will, as speedily as may be, submit for consideration comprehensive measures of relief, whereby not only Congress but the people will be relieved from the corrupting curse of private or special legislation. We may not longer, with a due regard for the best interests of the country, blind our eyes to the necessity for radical and thorough reform in this regard.

Again, sir, there is another class of claims, the consideration of which ought to be summarily and forever ended, if need be by constitutional prohibition. I allude to those commonly known as war claims. Ever since the suppression of the rebellion the persistence with which this class of claims has been pressed upon the attention of Congress has furnished well-grounded and grave fears in the mind of the people that it is the determined purpose of the democratic party in the event of ascendancy to compel the Government to assume and pay all losses and damages resulting from the prosecution of the war in defense of our nationality. Each succeeding year furnishes cumulative evidence in support of the truth of the charge that such is the well-settled purpose of those who control the action of that party. For a time the approaches to the Treasury were cautious, guarded, gradual, and well calculated to deceive the unsuspecting. In all time precedent has served an effective purpose. One act serves as a finger-board to point the way to commit another, and it in turn serves a like purpose, until soon you have a highway blazed and open in which the multitude travel to the desired haven. The first effort in behalf of this class of claims has been to nail up the finger-boards, to establish precedent. The character of claim best suited to successfully accomplish the purpose is pressed to the front. Our love for the school, our veneration for the church, our tender regard for whatever is of historic interest as connected with our early or colonial history is appealed to. The purpose of all this is so manifest that I will not attempt a criticism in the presence of the general intelligence of members of this House, but only say the people well understand it and will no longer be deceived. I am aware that some of our democratic friends deny that it is their purpose to hold the Government liable for the destruction of property by the Army or for use and occupation, but, gentlemen, acts speak louder than words.

Let me call attention to the extraordinary diligence with which this class of claims have been marshaled and presented. Consult, if you please, the record of the Court of Claims and of the southern claims commission and the files of the War Department, and take an inventory of the multitude of rejected claims which did not come within the provisions of the statute. Why filed, why presented to tribunals which did not have jurisdiction? It was one of the means resorted to for the purpose of asserting an alleged claim of right, of manufacturing evidence, of diligence in the assertion and prosecution of such claim, of creating and perpetuating a record of intention in the premises. Failing in the first instance before these tribunals, what has been the next step? Bills are introduced to extend or enlarge the jurisdiction of these tribunals so as to give relief in special cases, special bills for particular cases, the real object being to thereby extort and obtain an admission from the Government upon the question of liability. How persistently and with what consummate skill and ability this class of bills have been pressed upon the attention of committees. The adroit and skillful attorney knows full well that by procuring the enactment of such statutes he may hereafter stand upon them as solid ground and defiantly assert in the face of the Government that she is fully committed by her own deliberate, solemn legislative act to a liability to pay this class of claims, and that she is estopped to question liability by reason of the legislative recognition of liability to pay war claims. Consult your files and you will be astounded at the number of this class of bills, apparently fair and harmless but charged with deadly poison to national life. Then comes the terrible flood of private bills which threaten to submerge every interest—claims for use, loss, or damage to every conceivable species of property. The men who supported and sustained the Government in the hour of peril are now threatened by force of law with a liability for all losses and damages sustained by those who failed in an effort to disrupt and destroy it, and this fearful threat which hangs to-day over the heads of the people is uttered by the controlling element of the democratic party.

The isolated exceptions here and there who aver that they do not and would not sanction this monstrous and wholesale robbery of the substance of the people would be utterly powerless to prevent it should that party obtain the controlling power in the administration of the Government. If it is not the purpose to press those claims to ultimate payment, why the record already made?

During the last presidential canvass the people to some extent were informed of the magnitude of this threatened assault upon the Treasury. True, they had not then and have not now a correct conception of the fabulous amount which would be extorted from them if this democratic raid upon the Treasury is successful. Nevertheless, they learned enough to give expression to such opinions as struck terror to the heart of Samuel J. Tilden and impelled him over his own signature through the public prints to assure the people that for their protection he would interpose his veto. I do not believe for one moment that he would have dared to exercise the veto power. His southern masters would have decreed otherwise and the backbone and knee of the northern democrat has so long been accustomed to unbinge and bend at the crack of the southern lash that I must be pardoned for expressing a want of confidence in expressions of individual independence. All the ills which afflict the country to-day could have been averted had the presidential chair from 1845 to 1861 been filled by a lion-hearted, Union-loving Jackson instead of one who in this presence shall be nameless. Some time since, as a matter of personal information, I concluded to examine the pile of bills introduced since this Congress convened, and to make an abstract of those referred to the Committee on War Claims, that abstract to give the number of the bill, the name of the member introducing the same, the name of the party for whose benefit or relief it was introduced, the residence of the claimant, on what account the claim was based, and the amount claimed. I have carefully examined thirty-seven hundred and ten of the bills introduced, and the abstract of the character stated of those referred to the Committee on War Claims I will, by leave of the House, print as a part of my remarks. It will be observed that over seven hundred bills yet remain to be examined, and the abstract of those examined only includes those referred in the first instance to the Committee on War Claims. It will indicate to some extent the number and character of the bills, and the amounts sought to be filched from the people. By reference thereto some of the older members may be enabled to recall the familiar sound of names which greeted their ears in the last and previous sessions of Congress. They have come again and will keep coming, and still more will come to join the multitudinous throng until the people rise in their majesty and imperiously demand that they be shut out forever by constitutional prohibition.

If, however, the people do not exercise a vigilance equal to the impending peril; if they send as representatives to these halls men who dare not fearlessly throttle this class of claims, then just so certain and so soon as the democratic party has the power to give them welcome, they will come to stay and gnaw at the vitals and quench their thirst with the life-blood of the nation. Sir, the fundamental theory upon which all these bills are based is that the Government of the United States and every soldier of the Union Army was a trespasser, a wrong-doer, from 1861 to 1865; that the moment the Union soldier planted his foot upon the soil over which the so-called confederate government attempted to usurp jurisdiction the nation became liable for all acts of the Army while engaged in suppressing the rebellion. Hence we are now asked to appropriate money to rebuild State-houses, court-houses, jails, and other county buildings; churches, school-houses, halls, buildings, towns: to pay for every species of personality, rents, or damages for use and occupation; yea, more, to repair or rebuild bridges, turnpikes, and macadamized roads alleged to have been seriously damaged by the tramp of Union soldiery and the banking over them of Union cannon and Army supplies. I am not prepared to indorse the theory upon which this class of claims is based. It embraces a heresy as obnoxious to our nationality as the doctrine of secession. I trust every patriot in the land will aid in rooting out forever every vestige and relic of a heresy which has cost us already quite enough blood and treasure; and I say to you, that no measure in the interest of peace and conciliation would accomplish more in that direction and to that end than an absolute bar against all such claims.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE.

Mr. PEDDIE. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a bill to establish a Department of Commerce, to which I desire to call the attention of the House. The first section of that bill provides:

That there shall be established an Executive Department, to be called the Department of Commerce. Said Department shall be charged with the supervision and care of the commercial, manufacturing, and shipping interests of the United States, so far as the same may be confided to the National Government by the Constitution.

In the midst of the present business depression, I beg leave to say a few words in regard to the material interest of our country. The policy of encouraging lines of steamers by liberal compensation for carrying the mails has been discussed in this body and elsewhere. I shall not attempt to go into detail, but take this occasion to say I approve such a policy, and am prepared to support it with my vote. It seems to me discreditable to us, as a people, that our goods cannot go to the South American ports without first touching at Liverpool; in a word, that this nation has not a single line of steamers to carry our products to those countries that geographically belong to us to supply.

I have been pleased to read the letters of our consuls abroad in response to orders from the honorable Secretary of State, whose earnest efforts in this direction have already been productive in throwing much light upon many matters bearing upon the export trade of our country. This is a step in the right direction, but we must do something more than this. It is a good thing to know that there are other countries waiting for the products of our mills and soil, but it is of little practical value unless we have the means of transporting those very goods. We not only want to establish steamship lines, but we want a Department of Commerce corresponding to the English Board of Trade, which extends its arm to every quarter of the globe, collecting and collating information which leads to the opening up of new markets for her overproductions; then follow her steamships and a trade which has made her the richest of nations and the common carrier upon the high seas.

The English government in its care for the trade interests of its people is like a great corporation. This is seen in the working of its board of trade; for be it understood the action of the Government in the interest of trade and commerce is through that department. When in London two years ago I noticed, in passing through her business streets, packages, bales, and boxes of goods marked to all parts of the world. On my return home I could but notice the difference, as our shipments were confined mostly within our own States. This is largely due to the sleepless watch and care of the department known as the board of trade, through which department her merchants have unlocked the doors of the most distant markets of the world. Go where you will you will find British ships and British wares.

Through the working of our protective tariff most of our manufacturing industries have been established so that we no longer fear foreign competition in our home market, and by adopting a more liberal scale of remuneration to our artisans than the European standard has resulted in developing superior skill and a greater perfection in its products. Lord Derby in an address to a meeting of some twenty thousand workmen in Edinburgh a few years since remarked that they must look well to their laurels, as the nation which paid the highest price for their labor was the one they had most to fear, not the cheap labor of other countries but the superior skill and ingenuity of the more liberally educated mechanics and artisans of America.

The exhibit of our late Centennial took the Old World by surprise; indeed the full measure of our progress had not been fully realized by our own people. We no longer need foreign stamps to recommend our goods. Let our manufacturers have their raw material duty free or as nearly so as possible, and let the Government extend a helping hand to build up our merchant marine and give us a department of commerce, with all its great future possibilities for good, then we shall soon find means for disposing of our overproductions, are bringing to our shores millions of dollars which are now diverted to other countries. Then we should be no longer pained with the fact that thousands and tens of thousands of honest labor are standing idle in our streets. Then the flagging energies of our people would wake to new life, when the spindles, looms, and all the implements of our varied industries would clang and hum again with activity.

This will solve the problem as to our ability to pay our debts and our taxes by giving us the means to pay with. Various causes have been assigned for this long-continued depression in business, but in my opinion the chief cause is that with the increased application of machinery in our manufactures our productive capacity has outstripped the wants of our people. The great want of the time is foreign markets for our products. We have them at our doors, but we have failed to improve as we should our opportunities. A new era is dawning; old issues have passed away; the great work before us is industrial and commercial developments. It is true that the teeming West will soon become the granary of the world; therefore we must open up new markets for her increased products, so that manufacturers and agriculturists will go hand in hand and help to restore the waste places, and with the blessing of a kind Providence cause our land again to rejoice with prosperity.

REPEAL OF BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. Speaker, I desire briefly to give the reasons why I am in favor of the repeal of the bankrupt act. That act has stood upon the statute-book of the United States for many years; an act which when it was passed was supposed to grant relief to thousands of people of the United States, who would receive its benefits, and those benefits would not only be given to them, but through them flow out to the people of this country.

Mr. Speaker, I need not say that some sort of a provision should be made for honest men who desire when the day of misfortune has befallen them to extricate themselves. That would be a benefit to the people, who are desirous at all times to do their business in a manner not only honorable to themselves but alike honorable to the creditors with whom they deal. But an act like the present, stretching over this broad country, investing courts with powers which will call from distant counties and towns parties before them who have not the means nor the money to do so, has been, in my judgment, a greater wrong to the people of this country than all the benefits that flow from it in any manner whatever.

Why, sir, in the case of this company or that corporation, or this insurance company, mutual in character, that has failed in its business, its claims are placed before the bankrupt court; thousands of parties perhaps have taken policies in that insurance company and have given premium notes from $10 to $20. Now, when these companies fail their policies go for nothing and the policy-holders have a good and valid defense, so they need not pay one of the claims made upon them. They may be sued perhaps to the number of one thousand where the claims may be for $10, the costs would amount to $50 or $60, on a judgment in the bankrupt court rendered against them, and without letting them in in any instance to set up a defense and never receive perhaps one cent by way of dividend. The assignee in bankruptcy and the officers of the court receive the fees perhaps of thousands of these victims scattered over a State. I have known of such instances, and I believe that the bankrupt act perpetrates more wrong upon the people than any benefit that could come from it.

Why, sir, in every State in this Union there is a law that provides that a claim under $100 or $200 shall be prosecuted in an inferior court, and if it is prosecuted in a court of original jurisdiction or a court of record there are no costs imposed on the judgment in case it amounts to less than the jurisdiction given in an inferior court.

But, sir, in a court of bankruptcy if there is a claim by the assignee in bankruptcy and he sues the party and brings him three hundred to four hundred miles, because the claim is small the man cannot afford to come and has to submit to the judgment against him and submit to costs of five times the amount of the judgment because he could not afford to travel this great distance to defend his case. Another case I will cite. There has never been in this country the case of a man or partnership that honestly failed in business, who were unable to meet their claims, whose creditors are not ready to say to them, "We will let you go along in business and wait for you;" but the case would be a rare exception when they would say, "We will have the last drop of blood from you, and we will hold judgment over your head and wait until you are successful again in business hereafter so we can recover against you the balance."

It is a matter of history that no man who ever failed in business was not met by his creditors on fair and equitable terms, and I will challenge the whole commercial world to show a case in which the spirit of equity and justice in all its transactions does not prevail. Let an honest man fail, and instead of his creditors refusing to compromise with him they will say, "We will make terms with you, believing you to be honest, so you may resume business. Now if there was a more beneficent plan adopted for honest debtors many business men, instead of going into bankruptcy, could go on with their business until prosperity again dawned upon them, enabling them to pay up in full and at the same time retain the confidence of the public."

Why, sir, I recollect of an instance in the great Chicago fire, of the great firm of Matson & Co., whom I have known since I was a small boy. I was told in June, 1876, by Mr. Matson that three days after that fire that gentleman, who had done a business of perhaps a million or two million dollars a year, I do not know how much, went to New York; that he went to the office of Enos Richardson & Co., the great jewelers of New York City, and to a great firm in Boston; that he went to Ball, Black & Co., and to Tiffany & Co., of New York, and that he told them he did not know he was worth one cent in the world. He had done business since he was a young man, first in the East, then in Milwaukee, and then in Chicago. They said to him: "Mr. Matson, we have done business with your firm for thirty years. You should not come here and talk to us about how much you are in our debt. We are acquainted with you. Take your stock of goods and go home; say nothing about your debts, and when you have made money enough to pay them, then there is time enough to talk to us about them." He selected his stock of goods, went back to the city of Chicago, had a place erected to go into trade again, and went on with his business. Enos Richardson, of New York City, called him into his counting-room and said: "Mr. Matson, here is my individual check for $50,000; take it; you may need it, and I want you to use it." There is an instance of what confidence in business can do.

It may be true in certain cases that some wise provision might be made by act of Congress in reference to voluntary assignments. I earnestly believe if ever men are driven by voluntary assignment into bankruptcy under the bankrupt act that wise provisions of some act for the mode of carrying out voluntary assignment would be of great beneficence to the country by providing, when the assignee under voluntary assignment has honestly fulfilled his office as trustee and made his dividends and a fair showing can be made to a court of original jurisdiction in the State where the party lives, he may then apply to that court or the United States district court, if you please, and have all claims which have not been presented barred, because in equity and at common law, after the assignment is made and dividends have been distributed, he can apply to any court of original jurisdiction and get an order, if claims are not presented within six months or a year, according to circumstances, they may be barred and then the party who has gone into voluntary assignment of his property and effects can apply to some court of competent jurisdiction, and on the report of the proper officer or referee for that purpose be discharged from his debts. It would bring the debtor and creditor close at home. It would take away all the stigma which has been cast on this present bankrupt act in driving parties from one end of the State to another, in giving fees to officers created by the act itself for that purpose, in giving fees to registers in bankruptcy, in giving a share to the assignee in bankruptcy, in giving fees to officers of the court to such an extent that in some cases when they have been ended the officers of the court have received all there was in the nut and the creditors have only received half of the shell. [Laughter.]

I say, Mr. Speaker, I believe one of the new eras which will dawn on this country will be that which will compel every man to stand upon his own credit and upon his own honesty, and when he stands there he will stand safely and he will need no bankrupt act. He will need no act of this character to help him out. It is an act which has offered a premium to dishonesty. It is an act which has enabled men to say to their creditors "If you receive such a percentage we will give it to you, but if you will not, then we will go into voluntary bankruptcy." The result has been, according to the experience of the commercial world, and especially in this country, as business men can testify, that rather than let the debtor go into bankruptcy they have been willing to accept what he offered; that the creditors have preferred rather to accept the certainty of the percentage offered than allow the debtor to go into bankruptcy with the result of having the proceeds go in the way of fees into the hands of the officers of the bankrupt court. Now, Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has ten minutes remaining.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I have but five minutes more, as I have promised to yield a portion of the time to another.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman think the bankrupt law has some good features? I have listened to his general denunciation. I have been led to believe by my experience and practice under the bankrupt law that it has some good features.

Mr. HUMPHREY. It would be strange, Mr. Speaker, if the bankrupt law did not have some good features.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I should like to hear from the gentleman from Wisconsin in reference to the matter of preferring creditors.

Mr. HUMPHREY. It has no feature in the matter of preferring creditors which the common law of the country does not give. In the case of a voluntary assignment the party has the right to prefer his creditors, if he desires, in certain cases. Under the bankrupt law a man can so provide in advance that he may prefer creditors before he goes into bankruptcy, so that nothing shall be left for common creditors after he has got through with his preferences.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that I believe to-day there is no feature about this bankrupt act which gives it such a character that we should retain it upon the statute-book. Men say there will be thousands of failures in the next six months. I say, if so, let them come. I would rather trust myself to-day in the hands of my creditors if I am honest than in the hands of registers in bankruptcy; and if I am dishonest I would rather trust myself with them than with my creditors.

I should have liked to spend some more minutes upon this question, but I have agreed to yield a portion of my time to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. MONEY,] and therefore I cannot dwell on it much longer. I desire in closing to say that this bankrupt law is like many other laws that exist in the country that are made for honest men and are never used to any great extent by the class of men that they are made for. The bankrupt law is chiefly used by that class of men who are not forced into bankruptcy by their creditors, but go into voluntary bankruptcy, as thousands do. I say that the act offers a premium to the class of men in this country who in some cases I have known have taken the benefit of it twice while it has been in existence, and who will be ready to take the benefit of it again if, instead of its being immediately repealed, its operation is to be extended to the 1st day of January next. I find no fault with that extension. It may be a hard thing for a large class of people to come to it at once. But I hope that on the 1st day of January next the bankrupt act will cease to exist. I hope that a bankrupt act passed by the Congress of the United States will never exist on our statute-book again, but that some other provision may be made that will meet the wants of honest men, and that no provision will ever again be made that will be constantly meeting the wants of dishonest men.

CLAIMS AGAINST THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. Speaker, the attempt is being very industriously made to alarm the caution and economy of the northern people with the scarecrow of southern claims. Pinstaking newspaper correspondents, with great hope and little scruple, searching for sensation, have paraded before the public a long list of demands upon the Treasury in behalf of southern people and southern enterprises. They have been circumstantially minute in detail and exaggeratedly incorrect in the aggregate exhibit. To swell the amount to a startling total they have not failed to add together the amounts asked in all the bills for the same object, and present their duplicated and triplicated amounts most unblushingly as a fair and honest statement. The republican stump orators in Congress have perhaps simulated an alarm they did not feel, and solemnly and pathetically warned the North that the southern people would demand pay for every house that was burned, every mule that was lamed, every slave that was freed, and every bale of cotton that was captured in the late civil war.

Whether these gentlemen really believe what they say or not we cannot perhaps ascertain. The evident design, however, of their declamation upon this subject is to create an impression which the facts and tendency of legislation will not justify, with the ulterior object of convincing the country that it would be exceedingly unsafe for the democratic party to come into power, and that a democratic representation from the South is a standing menace to the integrity of the Treasury, and that each southern Representative is here simply as a claim agent to press every kind and manner of claims, just or unjust, fair or false, with an obtuse sense of duty, an acute sense of spoliation, and a total insensibility to the general good. Above all they teach the doctrine, clear and sharp, that republican domination is the national safety, insuring administrative economy and official honesty. It is, Mr. Speaker, a most dangerous and pernicious doctrine that a majority of the voters of the United States (not even including the disfranchised Catholics of New Hampshire and Rhode Island, and the disfranchised poor of Massachusetts and Rhode Island, denied the privilege of saying who shall be their rulers because of the unequal dispensation of fortune) are incompetent to the administration of public affairs. This is a Government of the people, by the people, and for the people, administered for the benefit of each citizen, and for the greatest good of the greatest number. The idea that these gentlemen teach, that the rule of the majority is dangerous to the welfare of the country, is a heresy not to be tolerated in a free republic.

To properly inform the House and the country of the real danger to the Treasury we will present an exhibit of the claims made by northern representatives for northern communities upon the nation's purse.

I do not deem it necessary to make a thorough exposition of the glaring errors, intentional or otherwise, that have been given to the press as truth. I will state parenthetically a few prominent examples of duplication and duplicity. The sum of three millions is duplicated for the Mississippi levees; a million duplicated in bills providing for the payment of arrearages due certain persons of the United States prior to the war; and bills for railroads over the same line have been aggregated to represent the amount asked.

Now, the question, Mr. Speaker, is, is it possible that these claims with which politicians frighten the credulous voter of the North may ever be paid? As far as the payment for slaves and debts of the Confederate States is concerned, that is forever settled by the latter part of the fourth clause of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, which holds this language:

But neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations and claims shall be held illegal and void.

These gentlemen know that this clause cannot be amended except by two-thirds votes of both Houses and ratification of three-fourths of the States, or by act of a convention called by two-thirds of the States and ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States.

Only eleven States seceded from the Union; only fifteen owned slaves in 1861; and there are thirty-eight States in the Union. We might as well attempt to materialize the shadows of last year's clouds as to fix such claims as a charge upon the public Treasury. Coming down to another class of claims for service rendered, property converted, and bills for public improvements, will a careful exegesis show that there is anything unreasonable, unjust, unfair, or dishonest in these claims, or unwarranted by the Constitution and the laws as they exist? Is there anything in them that is not approved by a sound equity? I speak of these claims in their general character, and do not wish to be understood by any means to endorse each of them individually. Many of them are doubtless ill-founded, many false and fraudulent, not only of those pending, but also of many passed, adjudged, and paid.

The policy of some gentlemen in this House, and perhaps in executive position, is to decide a claim upon its locality. The idea of payment of claims is calculated for northern latitude exclusively. The southern claimant, poverty-stricken and almost hopeless, feels a growing sense of the injustice of the law's delay. My sympathies have not been very actively excited for those men of the South who prefer accounts against the Government for losses sustained during the war, backed by an oath that they never in any manner aided or assisted the rebellion or sympathized with the people engaged therein. A man of the South who, in that tremendous struggle in whose raging vortex was swept all the hopes, the fears, the aspirations, the prayers of his relatives, friends, neighbors, and fellow-citizens, yet stood unmoved, without the excitement of a natural sympathy, or one who, having felt himself moved to encourage and assist, and yet perjures himself simply for the refurbishing of his purse, is a man whose claim I can see fail with profound indifference.

But there is a class of claims which is a just indebtedness, and however much I doubt the policy, as I do, of vexing the ear of authority with cries for relief, yet this Government cannot afford to ignore them.

The proceeds of captured and abandoned property, after the payment of all expenses of collection, after payments made by the Secretary of the Treasury, and payments made under judgment of the Court of Claims, can yet be fairly estimated at $14,000,000, held in the Treasury, by a decision of the Supreme Court, a trust fund, and not the property of the United States, whose fiduciary capacity must be terminated by payment to the owner who can establish his right of property. Proof of loyalty is demanded as well as proof of proprietorship, and the time for such proof was limited to two years.

The general pardon and amnesty of the 25th of December, 1868, proclaimed "restoration of all rights to property, except as to slaves, and in property cases rights of third parties shall have intervened, and the claimant whose disabilities were thus removed have an equitable claim upon the Government for their property held in trust by the Government." Immediately after the war, when the southern people were stunned and dazed by that great disaster, with the black track of invading armies marking all their territories, countless homes in ashes, fences destroyed, and fields laid waste, they with heart of hope addressed themselves to the task of rebuilding their broken fortunes. Then, when they needed the strong hand of Federal power to sustain them in their efforts, it fell upon them as heavily as the mailed gauntlet of war, taking from their impoverished resources in four years in the cotton tax the vast sum of $83,000,000—a direct assault upon the great industry of the South. Our people realize that this tax will never be returned, but is it not worth the consideration of those gentlemen who scoff impatiently at the petitions for aid for southern improvements?

Would it not be an act of justice as well as of grace that some portion of this enormous confiscation should be returned in aid to internal improvements? As the hand of Federal power has rested heavily upon us in anger, would it not be wise and well for it to give one touch of benediction? This Government cannot afford to avoid an honest obligation. It cannot afford to do injustice to the meanest of its citizens. The highest duty of statesmanship is to so legislate and so administer the law that the Government may command the respect and affection of all its people. The people of the section which I have the honor in part to represent have realized how difficult a thing it is to placate the non-combatants of the war, gentlemen whose patriotism burned fiercely yet safely around their firesides, while the clangor of conflict resounded throughout the land, to flame still higher on the forum, in the hustings, in newspapers, and official positions, when gentle peace, white-winged, brooded like a dove over the reunited sections. We find it difficult sometimes to define our status in the Union. We feel that some of our brethren of the North consider that we are in the Union as to its burdens, out of it as to its benefits; in it as to taxation, out as to its privileges. Now we "would that thou wert either cold or hot." We desire to share with you whatever of good or evil our common destiny may bring us.

A little information easily accessible but steadily overlooked will show these economists who have constituted themselves the guardians of the public Treasury against every approach from any quarter than their own that there is some show of justice at least in the reasons urged for the assistance for southern improvements by the General Government.

I invite the attention of the House to the following:

Statement showing the amount of money expended by the Government of the United States from the adoption of the Constitution to 30th of June, 1873, in each State and Territory of the Union, for navy-yards, custom-houses, court-houses, and other public buildings; for the improvement of rivers and harbors, and for the construction of forts, arsenals, and armories, railroads, canals, and wagon-roads.

And to this, showing the number of acres of land granted the North and West for public improvements, in round numbers, one hundred and seventy-six million acres. For the Southern States, seventeen million acres.

As to the constitutional power of the Government to give its land, money on credit, I do not propose now to speak. However logical the argument deduced from the letter of the Constitution, either favorable or adverse to this power, the practice is well settled by long series of legislative and judicial acts. When we consider the vast domain that has been granted to northern enterprises—a territory equal in area to thirty-five such States as Massachusetts, enough to furnish a homestead to every homeless laborer in the United States—and the hundreds of millions of dollars lavished upon northern enterprises, we must admit that it is too late to argue the question of constitutionality, or at least too early, until the South has obtained a corresponding assistance.

The long list of southern claims that have been paraded through the papers and spoken of on this floor as some vast indefinite sum that was to bankrupt the Treasury, will, after it has been divested of the unveracious superfluities with which the imagination of speakers and writers has clothed it, appear insignificant compared with the following list of bills introduced during this Congress by northern men for the benefit of northern enterprises and northern people:

This sum is so stupendous that it bewilders the comprehension. The mind cannot entertain at one time the idea of even a thousand different objects, but when we reach hundreds of thousands, millions, hundreds of millions, billions, the impression is of vague vastness simply. To enable you to realize to some extent the amount of money these demands cover, I will ask you to consider this illustration: twenty-five hundred pounds' weight of silver dollars is a good load for four horses, one four-horse wagon on the road will occupy about seventeen yards, and the sum of money asked for by the northern people of this Congress will be a good load for a line of three hundred and seventy-five miles of four-horse wagons, as close as they could travel, each with twenty-five hundred pounds' weight of silver dollars. How many mortgaged farms and houses would this relieve, how many accounts it would balance, how many people it would save from misery! Gentlemen, look at this! How contemptibly insignificant appears the sum asked for by the South, compared with that demanded by the North. Even the reckless inexactness of the New York Tribune, with its duplication of bills, brings the aggregate amount asked for by the South to only $150,000,000. Millions, indeed! It really appears ridiculous to speak of millions, and I am ashamed of the wretched poverty of the southern idea of appropriations when I view the magnificent and Titanic schemes of our large-natured neighbors of the North.

Our array compared with theirs is as Falstaff's ragged regiment to the purple and gold glittering myriads of the Persian monarch; a mere skirmish line to the grand array. They speak of the "southern maw;" what have they to say of the northern maw? The one to the other as the tiny eddy in the brook to the maelstrom of the Norway coast. This northern maw is omnivorous and insatiable. The millions of acres of public lands, and millions of public money have not appeared but only whetted its appetite.

In making this statement of northern claims I do not, as do the gentlemen of the republican party, take account of the bills for pensions. I shall not sectionalize the soldier for a party benefit, I will not drag the man who offered his life for his country into the arena of politics, and I resent the depraved demagoguery that would thus utilize him. If nothing else can escape their touch I ask gentlemen to at least keep "hands off" these monuments of a republic's gratitude.

Reading the list of bills presented we are struck by its comprehensive character. Nothing is too stupendous to be attempted, nothing too trifling to be overlooked. It has "ample scope and verge" for everything that can deplete the Treasury. It ranges from an atom to the universe; from a billion-and-a-quarter canal to an eight-dollar-and-sixty-five-cent pair of pants. We can, Mr. Speaker, but admire the vigorous imagination of the gentleman from Kansas which spurns the dull possibilities of human achievement and soars into the empyrean of pure speculation. His canal bill seems the product of the brain of an oriental engineer delirious with hashish; a feverish dream mixed with recollection of the Arabian Nights; a canal, with its branches, over twenty-five hundred miles long, forty-five feet deep, and one hundred and fifty feet wide, (for it says that sea-going steamships must be able to pass each other;) to cross rivers and mountains, and whose bottom and sides are to be paved with stone. This beats Broddingnag. The Pittsburgh branch should be continued to New York and connect with a railroad across the Atlantic!

It would take all the quarries of all our mountains to pave this canal. It would engross all the labor of this hemisphere. Let De Lesseps hide his diminished head; his paltry canal would hardly be a respectable feeder for this magnificent water-way. Crops and Cephrenes were frugal of human labor in the comparison. As the antipodes of this we have the eminently practicable bill of the gentleman from New York, who moves the ponderous machinery of legislation to reimburse a soldier for loss of a blanket and pair of breeches destroyed by fire. Now, we will not ask what was this warrior doing walking to and fro on the face of the earth unbreeched? No objection will be made to the soldier's claim. Backed by the suavity of manner and energy in action of the gentleman from New York, it may already be counted successful. They tell us of southern raids on the Treasury! This is not a northern raid; it is a campaign, a siege. They have sat down before the Treasury and encompassed it round about, and the "gainful pillage" which paid their former efforts warrants their expectations of success.

Mr. Speaker, if the South could get one-fifth of the $158,000,000 involved in the bill of the gentleman from Indiana, providing for a double-track railroad from New York to Council Bluffs, we would be glad to take it in full satisfaction as an offset to the treasure lavished upon the railroads, rivers, canals, and harbors of the North. I do not wish to be understood as advocating the enrichment of vast corporations from the public Treasury. I am simply instituting a comparison between the demands of the North and South that the country may see how little this outcry about southern claims is prompted by a true regard for economy, and to show that it is blatant demagoguery and political claptrap. As far as I am concerned I will cheerfully support a bill to remove every class of claims from Congress to a court of proper jurisdiction, for in my opinion it is neither wise nor safe that Congress should audit accounts and vote settlements with the individual creditors of the nation. For two reasons they should be removed from Congress; first, for judicial determination; and, second, to eliminate them from politics.

A look back over the history of the country will show which party has been the party of economy. - Go to the RECORD of the last three Congresses, and the character of republicans and democrats as the disbursers of the public moneys stands attested in figures that cannot be put down by mere assertion or assumption. The Forty-second and Forty-third Congresses were both republican; the majority in both the Senate and the House was resistless. The republican party had the reins of government in its own hands, and the legislation bore the character they chose to stamp upon it. There was no cry of economy on their part; flushed with power, they did not see that the great public conscience had sickened at their profligacy. The claim business flourished; claim agents made fortunes. The honorable Secretary of the Treasury, when he was a Senator from Ohio, said in a speech made in the beginning of the campaign of 1875 that Congress had paid one hundred millions of war claims. What Congress? Republican! Republican Congresses had paid this amount without stunning the tympanum of the northern ear with howls about "confederate raids on the Treasury." Congressmen, with the thoughtful providence of Dugald Dalgetty, seized the opportunity to "provision the garrison." It was notorious that the bigger the claim and the smaller the reason for it the better its chance of success. It had to be "fat" enough to pay commissions and declare dividends. Do northern voters think that these are the gentlemen to raise the "raw head and bloody bones" of southern claims?

The carnival of public spoliation was not yet exhausted. In the Forty-second Congress the republicans allowed claims to the amount of $1,133,869; in the Forty-third Congress to the amount of $1,333,421. In 1876 the democrats held the House by the overwhelming majority of seventy-three; a great part of the majority were ex-confederates. The Southern States had at last sent their own sons to the national council; yet the Forty-fourth Congress allowed claims to the amount of only $958,830. And what became of the great rings? It seems that the democratic party had put an end to the profits of the claim agent, the vast plunder of the rings, and the business of the lobby. The records of Congress show conclusively that the staunchest and most faithful guardians of the public Treasury, the strictest and most consistent economists, are the democrats. Before the South had a representation of her own people upon this floor, the history of legislation bears ample testimony to the vigilance and caution of northern democrats in protecting the Treasury from the many schemes that were planned against it. They stood as a bulwark against the wasteful flood of extravagance that in sixteen years had distinguished republican administrations. They had been too well grounded in the rudiments of the democratic faith taught by Jefferson and Madison to yield to the profligate tendency of their time, and there is nothing in their conduct to-day, or in the past, in this regard that does not invite the confidence of the people of the North and of the whole country. They stand to-day the advocates of retrenchment and reform, the champions of local self-government, that cornerstone of the Federal Union and conservator of free institutions.

Happy, indeed, for this country, that in its time of danger and trouble there existed a democratic party in the North who, maintaining the integrity of the Union, yet kept their judgments undimmed by prejudice; and loving the Union as a whole, loved too all its sections, and stood the agents of reconciliation to perfect the reunion of States and to protect the prostrate South from the vindictive oppression of those who in the fury and passion of civil strife lost sight of the very genius and character of that Union. In what have these democrats of the North shown themselves unworthy of the most generous trust? In every measure of legislation they have been the faithful champions of the people, whether in a hopeless minority or in a triumphant majority. They have been the enemies of corporations and rings, of centralization and despotism, waging the battle of popular rights, and maintaining the Constitution as our fathers gave it and as the years have made it.

The representative republican sentinel on the watch-tower is moved in season and out of season to preach his jeremiad upon the solid South. He lifts up his voice in lamentations; his knees smite together in the presence of this new danger. Macbeth was not more troubled when he saw Birnam wood come to Dunsinane. I beg these gentlemen not to be disturbed by imaginary dangers. There is nothing in the "solid South" that threatens danger to any principle of the Constitution or that will increase the afflictions of the long-suffering and sorely-tried people of this Republic. The "solid South" will not insist that the property restrictions which fetter the free action of the citizens of Rhode Island and Massachusetts shall be inflicted upon the people. She will not arrogate the prerogative of standing between the conscience of any man and his Maker; and she will never clasp hands in sympathy with Rhode Island and New Hampshire upon the disfranchisement of Roman Catholics.

What would gentlemen of the republican party have us of the South to do? What class of people could they reasonably expect to represent us in the Congress of the States? Is it a matter of wonder that southern men, identified with southern feeling and interest, should be selected to represent that feeling and interest? Do you not send from your own section those in accord with your people? You all know, and you do not regret it, that the day of the carpet-bagger is past. It must be that southern Representatives shall be those who moved with the great currents and tides of the southern mind, and in their representative and individual capacity, since they have resumed their places here, they have proved by their moderation and conservatism that their presence was a beneficent influence.

In the ordinary course of nature men are moved by the promptings of self-interest. For the sake of material and political prosperity the South works for peace and the things that make for peace. We are tired of being platformed upon; we are tired of being treated as a half-alien section. Our constant effort will be to remove every disturbing cause, every irritant that can heighten the fever of the body-politic. This is the interest, too, of the northern democracy.

When men's passions sink to rest then they begin to think, and this is the danger that threatens the republican party. The life of that party is in agitation, and if a cause for excitement cannot be found one must be imagined. Hence this yearning solicitude to preserve the fruits of the war. The fruits of the war cannot be endangered. The slave is freed and nothing can remand him to servitude, less than the power of Omnipotence. He has all the civil and political rights of the white man. Some republicans may desire his disfranchisement, but to the Southern States he is an element of power, an available strength in the electoral college and in Congress which we will not willingly give up. Putting it upon the ground of interest, the southern man has a stronger reason than any other can have in preserving the ballot in the hand of the negro.

The question of the supremacy of the Federal power has been decided through the arbitrament of the sword, and the constitution of my State declares that every citizen of Mississippi owes a paramount allegiance to the United States. What "fruits of the war" are threatened with destruction? Is this constant effort to prejudice southern representatives in the minds of northern people really necessary to republican success? Would not a wiser, more generous and magnanimous policy have fixed the scepter of power in republican hands through a long succession of administrations? Although born and reared in Mississippi, believing slavery was right, indoctrinated in the theory of "State rights," giving all I had to the confederacy, yet I can see that to the world the republican party, whether justified by the Constitution or not, occupied a position as the champion of human freedom that was not only commanding but almost inspired. They had the vantage-ground, but they have lost it by abuse of power, by licentious extravagance, by toleration of rings, by neglect of the interests of labor, by their conspicuous inability to realize that the war is over, and that peace, reconciliation, and good will are the essentials of public well-being.

The democratic party represents the interests of labor, the sentiments of the people, the spirit of our institutions. I appeal to the past. Go back down the shining years of our country's glory, and note the landmarks of the nation's progress. Every proud event in our history stands an eloquent memorial of democratic wisdom. Under the guidance of that party the thirteen feeble colonies, a mere fringe upon the Atlantic, have expanded into States and Territories that embrace a continent. Under it, Florida was acquired from Spain, Louisiana, stretching into the far northwest, from France; Texas, California, Nevada, Utah, Colorado, New Mexico, and Arizona from Mexico. Successful wars were waged, and in these changing years of peace and war and of almost unmixed prosperity the public expenditures never reached even half the amount of either of the last twelve years of peace. Through all that bright era the national honor was untarnished, not an insult unresented, nor a wrong unredressed.

It was its boast that under its care the Republic should receive no detriment. Then the broad hospitality of the American people found its fullest expression; the weary and oppressed of every land were invited to partake of our blessings. The fire upon the altar of liberty, kept burning with more than vestal vigilance, was the beacon blaze across the deep to light the nation's pilgrims to freedom's holy land. The splendid achievements of the democratic party are the pledges it offers. It pleads for a real union "of hearts and of hands," as well as "of lakes and of lands." It does not dwell upon the sorrowful spectacle of discordant and dissevered States, but to States harmonious and united; "distinct as the billows and one as the sea." It does not walk with averted face, beholding only an unhappy separation, but with eyes lighted with hope and fixed upon the future, taking in all its glorious possibilities. It recognizes that our career has only fairly begun; that the triumphs of our past endeavor are but the first fruits of that splendid harvest of results that awaits our honest trying.

It recognizes sectional lines only in geography, and its mission is restoration! Charles Sumner in all his life never did anything wiser or more patriotic than when he said he wished no inscription on battle-flags that perpetuated a jarring memory. The learned gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] in all his distinguished career never reached a more honorable eminence than when in the last Congress, in a fervid burst of impassioned eloquence, he exhorted the men of the North and of the South to cherish the mementos of their valor as a common heritage for the generations to come. No man of to-day can write the history of the last sixteen years. Orators and writers may state facts and express opinions, but the historian of these times is the product of another age. He who addresses himself to analyzing the contemporaneous record of these results, who notes the phenomena of the eccentric political movements, and studies the philosophy of the tendencies of thought and sentiment during the interstate war, will bring to the task a judgment unbiased by prejudice, a vision undimmed by the smoke and dust of conflict; and he will not see treason or rebellion, but he will see on both sides ardent devotion to principle, heroic courage in battle, manly fortitude in adversity, selfabnegation, and generous love of country. The assaults that brought secession, secession itself, and the consequent carnival of death will seem the delirium of a strong young nation, flushed with pride and drunken with success—a midsummer madness upon which in sober calm of recovered reason it looks with sad regret, asking "respite and repentance from the memory" of its excesses.

The Republic calls upon all her sons; the brains and the patriotism of every section is invoked. In the multitude of her counsellors she expects the wisdom that will lead our happiness and prosperity to the brightest consummation. No good can come of that spirit that would keep alive sectional animosities, that would establish in governmental policy distinctions in classes and localities unknown to the Constitution. We of the South ask the consideration given to others. Let there be done exact and equal justice to all. We ask that the home as well as the foreign creditor receive his dues. We know that the affection of the citizen is more valuable than the respect of the alien. We shall exercise charity toward all, and "still in our right hand carry gentle peace to silence envious tongues." We may be assailed with epithets, but, so far as manhood will permit, will forbear the expression of even a just indignation. We confide in the public justice, and with patience and hope await the rich blessings that must come of a thorough reconciliation of a reunited people.

REFUNDING THE NATIONAL DEBT—POSTAL SAVINGS-BANKS.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, the financial question is the great economic problem of this country and of this age. Its satisfactory solution is the supreme desire of the American people. With a country the greatest in extent and richest in resources of ancient or modern times, under a system of government the most beneficent that human wisdom ever formed, we present to-day a sad spectacle of poverty, suffering, and distress. The stagnation of business, the paralysis of industry, the idleness of labor, the destruction of property in the shrinkage of values and existing and impending bankruptcy, are expressions with which we have become familiar by daily repetition in these halls since we met in October. Different causes have been assigned and various explanations given for this unfortunate condition of the country. There are those who suppose that they have found the cause in extravagant living, in overtrading, and in wild and reckless speculation. They suggest, of course, economy in personal and family expenditures as a panacea for all our ills. Others have ascertained that the "Iliad of our woes" comes from an inflated, irredeemable paper currency, and recommend as a sovereign specific the resumption of specie payment. This school of political philosophers teaches the paradoxical doctrine that you can relieve the poverty of the people by destroying their property and increasing their debts. This solution finds its equal in absurdity only in that other theory that attributes our troubles to what is called overproduction. The advocates of this theory would insist that the distress which the country now suffers results from the abundance of the products of our mines, fields, and factories.

If this grand discovery that so unceremoniously explodes the doctrines of Adam Smith be true, then the remedy, simple and complete, is at hand. We have only to destroy what we have and cease to produce any more. All this nonsense is worse than trifling with the gravest questions of public interest. The people of this country thoroughly understand the cause of their distress. They find it in the overwhelming indebtedness of the country—the Government and the people—and in the financial policy of the Government manipulated by syndicates in the interest of non-taxed capital, and against the property and labor, upon which class legislation has imposed enormous burdens of iniquitous taxation. That financial policy they have arraigned and denounced, and that financial policy it is the object of this bill to change and improve. A simple statement of what the legislation upon this subject has been is the clearest demonstration of its folly and of its injustice. The national bank act secures a monopoly of the banking business to the bondholders. This monopoly is protected by a prohibitory tax of 10 per cent. upon the issues of State banks. The Government pays to the bondholding bankers 6 per cent. in gold semi-annually, and gives them the use of $90,000 on every $100,000 in bonds deposited in the Treasury; and all this is done at an annual expense to the people of at least $15,000,000.

Between the years 1862 and 1868 the Government of the United States issued and sold bonds amounting to the sum of $2,059,975,700, for which it realized in gold or gold value $1,371,424,238, a loss to the Government and a gain to the purchasers of the sum of $678,551,460. The interest on this sum for ten years, at 6 per cent., amounts to the sum of $407,130,876. There is therefore now a debt upon the American people, principal and interest, amounting to the gigantic sum of $1,085,682,336—one-half of the public debt, for which, in fact, the Government never received one cent, and for which the creditors never paid one cent. And this is the fountain from which the bitter waters of distress now deluging the entire country have flowed; and this is the debt around which constitutional guarantees have been thrown. The fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution declares, among other things, "That the validity of the public debt shall never be questioned." This debt was originally payable in paper money or lawful money. It was not originally payable in coin. The act of 13th of March, 1869, pledged the faith of the Government to its payment in coin; the act of 12th of February, 1873, demonet-izing silver, left gold the only legal-tender coin in which it could be paid.

The financial policy which I arraign has fastened upon the people of this country this vast gold-bearing debt under which they are staggering and with which they are crushed, when the Government received nothing for it, and which in fact constitutes the spoils which war speculators coined out of blood. Since this debt was created and converted into a gold debt, the policy has been to constantly contract the volume of the currency, while the population of the country was rapidly increasing, and the wants and necessities of the people steadily multiplying. The amount of the currency outstanding in 1866, was $1,606,987,643. In 1876 it was only $748,912,072, a reduction in the volume of the currency in ten years of $848,074,570, an annual average diminution for ten years of $84,807,457.

The financial system or policy of the Government, manipulated by syndicates, gold rings, bondholders, and bullion brokers in the interest of capital at the sacrifice of every other interest, culminated in the passage of the act of June 14, 1875. This act required the Government to redeem in gold the outstanding legal-tender notes on the 1st day of January, 1879. To carry out the provisions of this act the Secretary of the Treasury informs us that he has purchased $15,000,000 of coin by the sale of 4½ per cent. bonds, and $25,000,000 with 4 per cent. bonds. The bonded debt of the United States is thus increased the sum of $40,000,000, carrying an annual interest of $1,670,000, to redeem and withdraw from circulation an equal amount of legal-tender notes which bear no interest. And the Secretary informs us that he must have fifty millions more of coin to make resumption practicable, which he proposes to purchase with 4½ per cent. gold bonds, thus increasing the public debt ninety millions, with an annual interest of $3,650,000. And this is what it costs the people to enable the Government to deprive them of the means of paying their debts and prosecuting their business.

With the bonded debt of the United States converted by legislation, not by contract, into a coin debt at a high rate of interest and constantly increased; silver demonetized, leaving gold the only currency in which the debt could be paid; the legal-tender notes redeemed and destroyed or hoarded in the Treasury; State banks strangled, taxed out of existence, the people of this country, numbering nearly fifty millions, would have left to them $320,000,000, to pay their debts and conduct their business, of national-bank notes, issued by the Government to the banks, to be let out or drawn in as their interest or caprice might dictate.

This legislation is very rapidly making the stock-jobbers, gold gamblers, and money rings the owners of the property and the masters of the people of this country. Thus the financial legislation stood at the meeting of the extra session of the Forty-fifth Congress, the result of which is seen in the fact that the Government securities were at a premium, the property of the country ruinously depreciated and its business destroyed. After this wicked scheme of class legislation, running through a period of ten years and indorsed by an administration distinguished for its appreciation of gifts, if for nothing else, had been accomplished, and while the saints who worship only at mammon's shrine, jubilant with triumph, were reveling in high carnival, in fancied security, Congress met and the "hand writing appeared on the wall." The people had cast the ballot into the scale like the sword of Brennus, and it outweighed their gold. And all at once there rings through the land, from these Halls and from a subsidized and prostituted press, the cry about plighted faith, public credit, and national honor.

And while the men of this generation and their children are writhing under the burdens this monstrous crime against humanity has imposed upon them, like Laocoön and his sons in the crushing coils of the serpent, it is just discovered that it is extremely unwise for Congress to legislate upon the subject of finance. Political economists and doctrinaires tell us that these questions are above legislative control; that they are matters to be regulated and adjusted by commercial values and the laws of trade. The Government contractors, speculators, and bounty-jumpers of the war period now serenely draw semi-annually in gold the interest on their bonds purchased at 50 per cent. of their nominal value and exempt from taxation, while the Government taxes even the match with which poor war widows, North and South, kindle the fire with which they cook their scanty meal. I repeat that the cause of the distress upon the country is to be found mainly in this stupendous national debt, largely contracted without an equivalent, and in that system of legislation which has constantly increased its amount by enhancing its value and diminishing the means of its payment.

Having intrenched themselves behind this legislation, conscious of the power with which these spoliations have invested them, the extent of their demands is only equalled by the offensiveness of their insolence. One of their organs has made the announcement that—

The American laborer must make up his mind henceforth not to be so much better off than the European laborer. Men must be content to work for low wages. In this way the workingman will be nearer to that station in life to which it has pleased God to call him.

This is an oracular pronunciamiento from the money power that the condition of the American laborer is a state of serfdom, and that God has been pleased to appoint him to a station of inferiority in all the relations of life. This is the legitimate result of that class legislation in the interest of money and against all other interests in the country which I condemn and denounce. Yet the laborer pays the taxes and fights the battles of the country. And when we warn the people that this legislation is establishing a rich class and a poor class, and making a line of distinction in men in this Government of freedom and equality, and thus silently but certainly subverting our free institutions and destroying equality and ultimately liberty, arrogant capital, "invisible in war and invincible in peace," concealing its cormorant rapacity by a false pretense to the mild virtue of timidity, raises the cry of agrarianism and communism, and insists upon increasing the Army to preserve order and suppress strikes.

This Congress when it assembled addressed itself with commendable dispatch and earnestness to the relief of the anxiety and distress of the country, and commenced to change the mischievous legislation from which our troubles have sprung.

The passage of the silver bill and the bill to repeal the specie-resumption act, if it succeed, will break up the conspiracy between foreign and domestic bondholders to destroy the country. Stop the contraction of the currency and the shrinkage in the value of property. Utilize one of the great resources of the country, diminish the amount of the public debt by making it payable in a cheaper currency and make its ultimate extinction a possibility. The country can never have financial prosperity so long as foreign creditors backed by foreign governments control its financial policy in their own interest. We want the public securities held by our own people and at a lower rate of interest. When this shall have been accomplished and capital is made to bear its just share of taxation, then we can reform our revenue system, reduce taxation, and sooner or later discharge the entire public debt.

In my judgment the bill under consideration will contribute more to this most desirable result than any measure that has been presented or that can be suggested. That if it become a law it will afford practical and speedy relief to both the Government and people I do not entertain the slightest doubt.

In brief, it provides that any holder of money may deposit the same to the amount of $10 in any postal money-order office in the United States, to whom the postmaster shall issue a postal order on the Treasury, which, when presented in sums of $10 or any multiple thereof, shall be receivable in exchange for postal savings-bonds of the United States, to be issued by the Secretary of the Treasury in denominations of ten, twenty, fifty, and one hundred dollars, bearing interest at the rate of 3.65 per cent. per annum, the interest payable every three months. These savings-bonds are exchangeable for notes of the United States, and also for 4 per cent. bonds authorized to be issued under and by virtue of the act of 14th July, 1870. This bill makes every postal money-order office in the United States, for all practical purposes, a savings-bank in which the holder of money may deposit the same in a place of absolute security to him. It involves no additional expense. It requires no legal machinery except what may readily be provided by departmental regulation, adjustable to the test of trial and the suggestions of experience.

The liability of the Government to the depositor is the guarantee of his safety; and such bond as the Government may require under such regulations as the Department may adopt secures the Government against loss. It is a safe and convenient place of deposit, in which the earnings of labor and the acquisitions of industry can be preserved in sums of twenty-five cents and upward to as much as $20 in a day. It will furnish an incentive to industry, encourage frugality, foster economy, and soon develop its beneficent results in sheltering the homeless, clothing the naked, and feeding the hungry. If it be true that recklessness and extravagance have been productive of all the mischief claimed, then the wisdom of that measure or policy that educates the people in the direction of economy and supplies them with a safe, convenient, and inexpensive means of preserving and increasing the rewards of their toil cannot be questioned.

In those sections of the Union where savings institutions exist it has been found to be true that by this means the daily wages of laborers among the poor have been carefully husbanded. Daily and weekly deposits of small amounts have been made until after a while the aggregate would surround them with comfort. And this has been the case while there was a painful apprehension of loss from the failure of the banks, which, unfortunately, in too many instances turned out to be well founded. And while losses in these institutions have been numbered by millions, and in the midst of wreck and ruin, there is now on deposit in the savings-banks of the Union, as shown by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, the sum of $843,154,804, deposited by 2,300,000. The American Almanac for 1878 shows the number of depositors in 1875 and 1876, in twelve States, comprising the New England States, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Minnesota, and California, to be 2,414,952, and the amount deposited to be $892,785,553. This is an average of $369.69 to each depositor. The learned editor of this valuable book, after showing that but partial and incomplete returns have been made, says:

It may be safely stated, however, from the returns which do exist, that the amount of deposits in savings-banks throughout the United States reaches, if it does not exceed $1,000,000,000 held by about 2,800,000 persons.

These facts show the popularity of these institutions. They also show that the depositors are the poor whom we always have with us, and they further show what a vast sum may be saved by a wise system of economy and frugality. Can any one doubt, in the face of these facts, that an immense amount would soon be saved by the poor people of the United States if they had the facilities for secure deposit which this bill provides?

The savings-bank is an institution of recent origin. It had its birth in the present century. Its career has been marked by signal success and beneficence. The British government has in successful operation a postal savings-bank system similar in many respects to the one sought to be established by this bill. There were in 1876 in her savings-banks, on deposit, about $350,000,000. The postal savings-bank, which this bill will establish, possesses the very decided advantage over ordinary savings-institutions of absolute security to the depositor. Money-orders are to be issued to depositors without interest, it is true, but negotiable by indorsement, and therefore valuable and convenient as a circulating medium and receivable in exchange for United States bonds bearing interest at the rate of 3.65 per cent. per annum of the denomination of ten, twenty, fifty, and one hundred dollars. These bonds have all the attributes of a medium and an investment. The amount, the facility with which the interest can be computed, and their negotiability by delivery will give them popularity with the people as money and as an investment.

If they should not circulate as a medium they are exchangeable for United States notes, so that they could be readily converted into money at the will or convenience of the holder. This exchangeable quality would make the currency adjust itself to the demands of trade and maintain steadiness in the value of property and products. During the business seasons, when crops are put upon the market, they could and would be exchanged for notes. And in the intervals of quiet the notes would be exchanged for bonds. The markets in this way would be relieved from the extortion and speculation of the banks. Thus the business necessities of the country would be supplied with a currency as occasion required and capitalists, large and small, with the means of a safe investment at a seasonably remunerative interest.

The fourth section of the bill provides that all moneys received into the Treasury in pursuance of this act shall be applied exclusively to the redemption of such bonds of the United States as are redeemable at the pleasure of the Government; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall call in of such bonds those that bear the highest rate of interest.

The object of this bill is to refund the public debt in securities bearing a lower rate of interest, payable in currency, change our foreign debt into a debt due to our people, and the postal savings-bank system is adopted as the means of raising the money to pay existing bonds. In discussing this bill and kindred measures two questions arise: Is the object desirable, and is the plan practicable? I maintain the affirmative of both propositions. Reference has already been made to the amount of the public debt and the unwise and unjust legislation with regard thereto as the principal cause of our present troubles. The total public debt, less cash in the Treasury, February 1, 1878, is $2,044,287,366. Of this amount $1,726,933,750 bears interest in coin at the following rates:

Bonds at 6 per cent.	$748,667,100
Bonds at 5 per cent.	703,326,150
Bonds at 4½ per cent.	230,000,000
Bonds at 4 per cent.	75,000,000
Total principal.	1,726,933,750

The interest due on this debt on the 1st day of January, 1878, amounted to $21,827,524. Of the 6 per cent. bonds $660,000,000 are redeemable at the pleasure of the United States, and of the whole $1,452,000,000 are redeemable on or before the 1st day of May, 1881. The amount of the public debt held by foreigners is variously estimated. The best English authorities, Seyd and Baxter, estimate the entire amount of the debts of this country held abroad, including public and private debts of all descriptions, at between twenty and twenty-two hundred millions of dollars. Mr. Edward Young, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, estimates the national, State, municipal, and railroad debts held abroad at $1,050,000,000. This does not, of course, include private or individual indebtedness. There is no means of ascertaining precisely the amount of this debt. All, however, agree that it is immensely large. The Secretary of the Treasury estimates the debt of the United States Government held abroad at six hundred millions.

There are many and cogent reasons why it is desirable that this debt should be changed from a foreign into a domestic debt, should be owned and held by our own people. Debt is but another name for slavery. The debtor is always to a greater or less extent in the power of the creditor. That a large amount of bonds was held in Germany I suppose was one of the reasons that induced the German Empire to demonetize silver. That its demonetization in the United States was procured here by the bondholders in conspiracy with the creditors there I do not doubt. The financial independence of the United States, therefore, requires the ownership of the public securities at home. The export of gold to meet the constantly accruing interest on this debt drains the life-blood from the heart of the nation.

If this debt were refunded in bonds held by our own people it would stop the exportation of gold to pay the interest. The balance of trade, which last year amounted to the sum of $47,202,682, would turn the tide in our favor and bring to us an annual influx of gold, varying only in amount with that balance. We would thus not only not send abroad large amounts of gold as now to pay interest, but it would be paid to our own people, and we would receive from abroad the excess of our exports over imports in coin. The people of no government on earth that owes a large foreign debt bearing a high rate of interest ever was or ever will be prosperous long. But it is true that great national prosperity may coexist with a large public debt held at home and for the reason already given.

The British Government is a signal illustration of this truth. The public debt of England to-day amounts to $3,850,000,000. It is held by 126,331 of her own people. This debt bears only 3 per cent. interest. It consists of annuities sold by the Government to the people without any time fixed for redemption and with but little prospect that they will ever be redeemed. Yet with this immense debt upon the government the English are comparatively prosperous. This debt is kept at home and the interest is paid to the English people and constitutes that much of their general wealth. The vast commerce of the Kingdom brings into it constantly large quantities of coin and bullion, and the government maintains a financial policy that keeps all it gets. When we obtained the Geneva award of $15,500,000 in gold, England kept the gold and paid us in our bonds. With our national debt amounting to but little more than one-half of that of Great Britain, owned by our own people and bearing a low rate of interest, we would be independent of foreign creditors and foreign governments. And with our immense resources, mineral, manufacturing, agricultural, and commercial wisely developed, we would speedily become the richest as well as the most powerful nation of the world.

The Republic of France is a still more striking proof of the proposition that a government may owe its own people a large debt and yet be prosperous. The civilized world beheld with amazement as well as with admiration what seemed almost a financial miracle in the payment of the Prussian war indemnity. France paid in less than two years, in gold and silver, $1,000,000,000, at a time when her expenditures exceeded her revenues. It was paid at the close of a war in which two immense armies had trampled down the whole face of the country. Her capital was riddled with Prussian shells and reddened in communistic blood. The scepter was passing from a perishing dynasty and her unsettled form of government in transition through anarchy to a republic. How was this grandest financial achievement of all time and history accomplished?

It was done in this way: The French government put upon the market 5 per cent. rentes or bonds and appealed to the French to buy them, and they promptly took $1,640,000,000, advancing to the government money therefor. A second loan was so eagerly sought by them that the subscriptions covered the amount called for thirteen times over, compelling the government to award the rentes among the subscribers pro rata. As long ago as 1867 the debt of France was held by 1,095,683 persons of her own people, and now by a much greater number. The public debt of France, with a population of only 36,905,788 and an area of only 201,900 square miles, amounts to the almost fabulous sum of $4,095,600,000—more than twice as much as our own. Her revenues are $614,605,716, while her expenditures reach the sum of $519,334,162, an excess of expenditures over revenue of $4,728,446. Yet France has never repudiated any portion of her debt, has never dishonored her own paper, which is now at par with coin, and has never passed a resumption act, and her people are prosperous and happy.

There must be some solution of this prosperity. It cannot be found in the extent or value of her commerce. I was astonished to find that for the year 1876 her imports were only $4,111,000, and her exports $9,280,000, leaving a balance in her favor of only $5,179,000. It must be accounted for mainly by the fact that the national debt is due to the French people; that the interest is paid to them, and by them kept at home, constituting a part of the common wealth, and to the further fact that France floats a larger circulation per capita than any other civilized nation on earth. At all events, it is true that the national debt of France is held by the French people; that the circulation is more per capita than that of any other nation, and that her people are more prosperous and suffering less financial distress than those of any government in the world. This state of affairs does not result from the form nor the stability of the government. These are the facts of history, and the light they shed upon the question under consideration is worth infinitely more than the speculations of a thousand theorists. Who doubts that, with the public debt refunded at a lower rate of interest, owned by our own people, the country would soon be prosperous? The Government would certainly be independent of foreign capitalists and domestic stock-jobbers and bullion-brokers. The object of this bill is the accomplishment of this result.

The refunding of the public debt at a lower rate of interest, and the change of its ownership from foreigners to our own people, in the judgment of a majority of the Committee on Banking and Currency, in which I concur, will be secured by the passage of their bill. And if this object is attained the first important step will have been taken toward the ultimate extinction of the debt. But is this postal savings-bank system a practical one? Will it enable the Government to raise the money? The light of experience is always a safe guide. The test of trial affords some evidence of what may be accomplished.

I insist that this plan is feasible. The system proposed by the bill of the Committee on Banking and Currency is almost exactly the British system.

That system was inaugurated in Great Britain in 1863. It started with 301 postal savings-banks. It has since extended over Ireland and Scotland. In 1876 the number was 5,448 with 1,702,374 depositors, 1 in 19 of the whole population. The aggregate deposits amounted to the sum of $134,982,750. Only the poor deposit in this institution; it was intended only for them. The law establishing them limited the amount that could be deposited by one person, and contained a prohibition against depositing in more than one bank. This system has been a success in Great Britain. Why should it not be a success here? It was a favorite with the people and continues to be. It greatly diminished the deposits in the independent savings-banks, showing its popularity over these independent savings-banks with the English people. It would no doubt do the same here. But what if it did? Who has a right to complain? Certainly the depositors have the right to place their money where, in their judgment, it will be safest.

The confidence of the American people in these institutions will be shown by the amount of money they place in them. What is that amount? The deposits now held by the savings-banks in twelve States of the Union, as far as can be ascertained, as has already been shown, are $843,154,804. The report of the Comptroller of the Currency for 1875 shows that the deposits for that year in the savings-banks, State banks, and trust companies of the United States amounted to $1,346,014,813. This estimate is based upon imperfect reports. The amount is unquestionably larger. It may be safely assumed to be $1,500,000,000. I take it for granted that a very large portion of these deposits will be withdrawn, put into the institution created by this bill and invested in the bonds for the issue of which it provides, because of the superior security to the depositor and because of the facility with which the deposit can be changed into a currency or an investment.

There is very nearly enough money lying inactive or drawing a small interest in the savings-banks, State banks, and trust companies to pay the bonded debt of the United States. This bill makes it to the interest of the holders of this money to put it where the Government can use it for that purpose. The system we propose establishes forty-one hundred and forty-five postal savings-banks, located at convenient and accessible points in every State and Territory in the Union, affording facilities to almost every community in the entire country for the preservation and investment, without trouble and without expense, of the proceeds of the labor and industry of the people. And at the same time it enables the Government, without additional taxation, to raise the money to pay off the public debt now existing and refund it at an interest but little over one-half as much as it now pays. Does any one doubt the popularity of these savings institutions in the light of experience in Great Britain and the United States? And in view of their popularity does any one doubt that, with the increased facilities afforded and incentives inspired by this bill if it become the law, a sufficient sum would be raised to enable the Government to refund the public debt in the bonds proposed, and thus relieve the country from the high rate of interest it now pays, and that too within a very few years. With this accomplished, payment of the national debt, now pressing like an incubus upon the prosperity, the property, the hopes, and the hearts of the people of this country, would speedily follow. Then syndicates, money-rings, and combinations would be unable to shape the policy of the Government and control the destiny of the country. There is no conflict between capital and labor. Each is equally an important and indispensable factor in the solution of the problem of civilization. Each is the complement and the auxiliary of the other. Capital supplies labor with employment and rewards its endeavor. Labor furnishes to capital the means of profitable investment and opens new fields for adventurous enterprise. Each is equally entitled to legislative protection and encouragement, and to each is the world and the race equally indebted for their progress.

It is not against capital in the abstract nor when legitimately employed that complaint is made. But it is the corrupt and illegitimate use of money by bullion-brokers, stock-jobbers, and gambling combinations in the accomplishment of legislation in their own interest and against the public interest that the country condemns and denounces—that class of money-rings that produce corners in gold and panics in business to satiate an accursed thirst for gold that shames even that of Pizarro and his robber band. We have recently witnessed the humiliation of a great State by the bribery of the Legislature to enact a charter for the government of the greatest city in the Union that enabled one of these rings to rob the honest tax-payers of that city of millions of dollars. It is that greed for gain that acts from no motive but interest, that recognizes no law but selfishness, and worships no god but gold, that finds its fittest expression in the howlings of the maniacs around the counters of the exchange on Black Friday.

It is against these that the people of this country enter their solemn protest, and it is against these that every interest of this country demands protection. I honor the men who by energy and industry acquire fortunes, and who while they increase their means aid public enterprise and advance the public prosperity. And I honor men even more, like Peabody dead, and Corcoran living, who having acquired fortunes by the same honorable means dedicate them to great benevolent and humanitarian purposes. But capital is protected. We must not forget protection to the poor, says Sisumundi in his political economy:

On whatever side we look the same lesson meets us everywhere—protect the poor—and ought to be the study of the legislator and the Government. Protect the poor, for in consequence of their precarious condition they cannot contend with their rich without losing every day some of their advantages. Protect the poor, that they may keep by law, by custom, by a perpetual contract, that share of the income of the community which their labors ought to secure to them. Protect the poor, for they want support that they may have some leisure for intellectual development in order to advance in virtue. Protect the poor, for the greatest danger to law, and to public peace and stability, is the belief of the poor that they are oppressed. Protect the poor, if you wish industry to flourish, for the poor are the most important of consumers. Protect the poor, if your revenues require to be increased, for after you have carefully guarded the enjoyments of the poor you will find them the most important of contributors.

This bill makes no distinction in classes. It is exactly equal in its operations on all, as all laws should be, and still its passage, in my judgment, would be a peculiar blessing to the poor for the encouragement to industry which it gives and the means of preserving the rewards of that industry which it affords. Again, if it should accomplish the results claimed for it, and I doubt not it will, it will supply the money to pay the foreign debt and refund the national debt at a lower rate of interest in securities that will be held by our people. It would enable us to accomplish another most desirable object, the reduction of taxation and the reform of a revenue system that is unjust in its discrimination, oppressive in its amount, unwise in its policy, and a disgrace to the civilization of the nineteenth century in the mode and instruments of its enforcement. Fruitless efforts are made at each session of Congress to mitigate the burdens which it imposes upon the people. We are informed by the Secretary of the Treasury that we must diminish appropriations or increase the revenues.

If the interest on the public debt can be reduced, as proposed, nearly one-half, the gold sent abroad to pay the interest kept at home and paid out to our own people, with the influx of gold from abroad which the balance of trade gives us, then taxation can and will be reduced. But so long as we are compelled to raise money to pay the interest on the public debt at its present rate I see but little hope of less taxation.

Another benefit resulting from this measure is the identification of all classes in every section of the Union and in almost every community of each section with the credit of the Government. They will scrutinize more closely its financial policy and guard more vigilantly its expenditures and hold to a more strict accountability its officers and agents, and may prevent the precipitation upon the country of the question of repudiation.

Nearly one-half of the families of France have money in the public funds—are creditors of the government. To have their names in the grand livre of the public debt is esteemed an honor. It is an honor that is eagerly sought, as the promptness with which the rentes were taken shows. One of the effects of this wide diffusion of the public securities among the people of France is to unite them in maintaining the public credit. Of course they look upon the public debt as a most sacred obligation. The reason is obvious; it is due to themselves, and for it they paid a full consideration. They therefore maintain the public faith from motives of interest as well as sentiments of patriotism.

This sentiment does not change with a change in the form of their government. It is the same in the republic and in the monarchy. In our system of government, based upon the popular will and resting for support upon the popular affection, it is of the first importance that the people should be identified in interest as well as in sympathy with the Government in its policy as well as in its principles. The public debt of the United States, held by nearly fifty millions of people scattered all over our vast territory, would take from the financial question its sectional element, with the animosities which will always attach to it so long as it remains sectional. It will take from it its class element. And if this debt is refunded it will avoid the question of the consideration of the debt, which the American people may be driven to the necessity of raising unless we change our financial policy.

Another vital result of this measure will be the general diffusion of the money paid out for interest over the whole country. It will not only not go out of the country as now, but it will not be concentrated in one or two great money centers. It will flow out from the Treasury, like the blood from the heart, to the extremities of the country in every direction and through all sections, vitalizing industry, rewarding labor, and stimulating enterprise.

My conviction is thorough that, with silver remonetized and that vast resource of national wealth utilized in currency, the resumption act repealed and any further contraction of the volume of the currency prevented, this bill passed into a law and faithfully administered, the whole public debt of the United States can be speedily refunded at a rate of interest but little more than half what we now pay, and the current of specie changed from foreign countries to us instead of from us to them, and that "gravitation shifting will turn the other way," from depression to activity, from bankruptcy and ruin to prosperity and wealth.

Then we can develop the grand and diversified resources of this magnificent country, whose vastness and variety defy and fatigue the computation of mathematics.

Then we can abolish a revenue system that violates the Constitution, that outrages popular sentiment, that wrings from honest toil the earnings of its sweat, and that exhausts the substance of the people by the enormity of its demands.

Then the sound of hammers, the blasts of furnaces, the whirl of wheels, the hum of spindles, and the whistle of engines will fill the land with the music of industry. Then the Government can demand her awards against foreign powers in gold, and not be compelled to receive them in its own bonds. And then the people of this country, disenthralled from the financial slavery fastened upon them through the forms of law by bondholders and syndicates, can reap the fruits of their toil, rest in the protection of the law, and rejoice in the prosperity of their country.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The question being put, a division was called for.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think that the motion ought to prevail. There are now four standing committees of the Senate who have permission to sit during the sessions of the Senate, and to those committees is committed some of the most important business of the body. Their meetings during the sessions of the Senate make the Senate thin, and it would facilitate the public business if those Senators should have an opportunity to complete their deliberations in committee and report their conclusions to the Senate.

Mr. DAWES. It seems to me that so long as the Calendar is in its present situation we could not do better than to devote ourselves to it to-morrow. Really we can facilitate the business in that way, and I do not think the committees should be in session during the sitting of the Senate to-morrow. I believe it would very much impede the work upon the Calendar if we should adjourn over. I do not think certainly the Senate would be any thinner while the Calendar is being considered to-morrow than it is this morning while we are considering the question of adjourning over until Monday. I do hope that the Senate will not adjourn over.

The question being taken by a division, the yeas were 19 and the nays 17, no quorum voting.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks there is a quorum present.

Mr. ALLISON and Mr. EATON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 20, nays 24; as follows:

DISTRICT SPECIAL-IMPROVEMENT TAXES.

Mr. ROLLINS. I wish to secure the attention of the Senate to Senate bill No. 1088. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill at the present time.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 1088) to provide for the revision and correction of assessments for special improvements in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the enforcement of the collection of the unpaid assessments prepared under the thirty-seventh section of the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide a government for the District of Columbia," approved February 21, 1871, be, and the same is hereby, suspended until the said assessments shall have been revised and corrected as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. That the commissioners of the District of Columbia shall carefully revise and examine all statements heretofore made of the cost of any and all improvements for any part of which assessments have been prepared, or, in the absence of such statements, shall inquire and determine the fair and just cost of any and all improvements heretofore made upon the streets, avenues, alleys, and roads of the District of Columbia which have been or are liable to be assessed under the said act, and make a new statement of the cost thereof, showing, as near as may be, the kind and character of the work done, which said statement, when completed, shall be signed by the said commissioners, or a majority of them; and in determining the cost of the improvement of any street or avenue, alley or road, the said commissioners shall deduct one-half the cost of the intersections, and charge the same over to the intersecting street or avenue. They shall also ascertain and determine the amount chargeable to any street railroad by the terms of their charters or the general law, and the amount charged to or paid by the United States or the District of Columbia for improvements in front of property belonging to it, both of which amounts shall be deducted from the cost as found by them.

SEC. 3. That said commissioners shall ascertain the number of linear feet of the street, avenue, alley, or road over which any improvement extends, and the cost per linear foot upon the basis of the statement aforesaid, and also the number of front feet of all the property adjoining such improvement not owned by the United States or the District of Columbia, and shall assess upon each lot or subdivision of such property so adjoining such improvement for each front foot thereof one-sixth of the cost per linear foot ascertained as aforesaid. But such property shall not be assessed twice for like improvements, nor shall it be assessed for repairs or for the lowering of water-mains or the relaying of service-pipes where such work is caused by change of grade, nor for haul of grading in excess of that which reasonably could have been obtained, and for the purpose of equalizing the assessments for sewers where sewers have been laid down as a part of such improvement, the cost charged shall be that of a fifteen-inch pipe sewer, and wherever the contract for any pavement required two feet of grading to be done by the contractor therefor, the cost of such grading shall be deemed to be included in the contract price for such pavement, and truncated or triangular lots or spaces not suitable for subdivision shall be assessed in accordance with rules to be prescribed by said commissioners, not inconsistent herewith, and not exceeding the rate prescribed for in this act. And the amount so found and assessed shall be deemed and taken to be the proper apportionment of the expense chargeable to each lot according to the benefit conferred; and the balance of said cost and expense shall be chargeable to and paid out of the general fund of the District of Columbia. And the said commissioners shall thereupon make out a revised assessment, which shall be substituted for said original assessment, and be valid and effective as of the date of said original assessment.

SEC. 4. That whenever it shall be found that the amount of any assessment paid upon any lot exceeds the sum found to have been due by such revised assessment, the commissioners of the District shall thereupon issue to the person entitled thereto a certificate reciting the amount so found to have been overpaid, with the number of the square and lot, which said certificate shall be receivable in payment of any assessment for special improvements due and unpaid, or be payable out of the proceeds of such revised assessments hereafter collected, after the payment of such outstanding certificates as have been by law made payable out of said fund.

SEC. 5. That immediately upon the completion of any revised assessment, the said commissioners of the District of Columbia shall cause demand of payment to be made therefor, as now provided by law. If no change shall be made in the amount of any such assessment, the tax-lien certificate heretofore issued shall remain in full force and effect; and if any such assessment shall be decreased, the tax-lien certificate issued thereon shall stand and be enforced for the amount found to have been due by such revised assessment; and if the assessment shall be increased, an additional certificate may be issued on such increase, which shall have the same force and effect as though issued at the date of the original certificate; and in all cases where such certificates have not been issued, the said commissioners of the District, upon default in payment within thirty days after demand, shall issue certificates in the mode and to be disposed of as now provided by law, in accordance with such revised assessment; and whenever by such revised assessment any change shall be required to be made in any certificates heretofore issued, and now held by the commissioners of the sinking fund of said District, they shall be surrendered and canceled, and new certificates issued in accordance with such revised assessment, for the corrected amounts, bearing the same date and having the same force and effect as said original certificates. And any person holding any certificate or certificates issued on account of such original assessment, requiring to be changed to correspond to such revised assessment, may surrender the same to said commissioners, and receive in exchange therefor an equal amount of the certificates which may be issued under such revised assessment; and in case of such surrender, new certificates shall be issued as above provided in the case of the commissioners of the sinking fund.

SEC. 6. That any person who desires to contest or dispute any assessment heretofore made against his property on account of improvements may file with said commissioners a written statement, setting forth the grounds upon which he bases his claim; but in the case of all outstanding assessments, said statement shall be made within thirty days after the passage of this act; and within twenty days after the filing of said statement, unless further time be allowed by the commissioners, he shall submit such testimony as he may desire in reference thereto, which testimony shall be taken after notice to or in the presence of the attorney of the District, or some person authorized to act for him in the premises; and the said attorney shall have a reasonable time allowed him by said commissioners, before making their decision, if he shall so request, to answer the same. But any person aggrieved by the decision of said commissioners may, within ten days thereafter, appeal to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, whereupon the said commissioners shall certify the record of the case to said court, and the said supreme court shall proceed to hear and determine the questions involved as summarily as is consistent with justice and equity, giving such cases precedence upon the docket, and certify to the said commissioners the decision of said court.

SEC. 7. That all assessments for cost of work on unimproved streets, avenues, alleys, and roads hereafter made or authorized to be made shall be made by the commissioners of the District of Columbia, or their successors lawfully appointed, in accordance with the principles and rules heretofore prescribed. And all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith be, and the same are hereby, repealed: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to affect the rights of either party in any suit or suits now pending.

Mr. ROLLINS. I desire to move an amendment to the second section, which is a mere correction.

Mr. BAYARD. Is the bill before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BAYARD. Then the Senate has taken it up?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has.

Mr. BAYARD. I would say to the honorable Senator from New Hampshire that while I do not desire to embarrass the consideration of the bill, I do not wish to have it passed this morning. If, however, he will be good enough to make a statement and give an explanation of the effect and operation of this measure, I shall be very glad to hear him. My reason for objecting to its passage at this time is that I was called upon by two or three citizens of the District a few days since who stated to me that there were objections to the bill. I handed a copy of the bill to them, as it was reported prior to that time from the committee. They took it away for the purpose of making certain commentaries to enlighten me on the subject. I do not know what will be the nature of their criticism on the present measure; but I should feel better justified in my vote had I the opportunity of consultation with these parties in interest here. We all know that they have no local representative upon the floor of Congress, though they have a committee of course in either House, in charge of their particular affairs. I would suggest to the honorable Senator that it would be well for him to explain the object of the bill. I know that assessments for special improvements have been made in the past in this District absolutely ruinous in their amount to the poorer class of property-owners. The collection of the taxes so assessed has been contested in the courts of the District, and I believe that litigation is now pending in regard to it, if I am correctly informed.

Mr. ROLLINS. This bill would not interfere with any suits now pending at all.

Mr. BAYARD. I have been informed that it would.

Mr. ROLLINS. Every man's rights are fully protected.

Mr. BAYARD. I had a strong impression, and I can scarcely be mistaken in respect to it, that the collection of those taxes has been enjoined by the courts of the District, that property-holders applied for injunctions and obtained them. I may be wrong as to this fact, but the impression is very strong in my mind that such is the case.

Mr. ROLLINS. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that actually they are all enjoined, for no progress whatever has been made in the adjustment of these special-improvement taxes, and none can be made under the existing law. This bill undertakes to provide a way for the settlement of these special-improvement taxes and seeing that justice is done to the tax-payers.

Mr. BAYARD. I would be very glad indeed if the honorable Senator would state the purport and effect of the bill.

Mr. ROLLINS. It gives the commissioners of the District of Columbia power to revise the assessments and to reduce them where they are erroneous, to correct all errors and to do justice to the citizens, and if they do not do justice there is an appeal to the District supreme court which is ample to protect all their rights. There have been many errors no doubt in the assessment of these taxes in various parts of the city. In some instances the errors amount to a very large sum of money. This bill provides for the correction of errors that have occurred.

Mr. BAYARD. A very casual examination of the bill would seem to show—and I refer now to section 5 of the substitute proposed by the committee—that the tax-lien certificates which have been issued under prior assessments are to remain in full force and effect, and that any person holding any certificate issued on account of such original assessment requiring to be changed to correspond to such revised assessment may surrender the same to the commissioners and receive in exchange therefor an equal amount of the certificates which may be issued under such revised assessment.

Mr. DORSEY. If the Senator from Delaware will take the bill together, and not select one section alone, he will understand more thoroughly to what the section from which he has just read alludes. To state briefly the object expected to be attained by the passage of the bill, I will say that under the thirty-seventh section of the act erecting the territorial government here, which organized the board of public works, the Legislature of the District were empowered with authority to levy taxes for special improvements. The Legislature passed an act to that effect August 10, 1871. Pursuant to that act the board of public works proceeded to make these extensive improvements. Whether that act clothed them with the full power to do what they did, I think at this late day it is hardly worth while to discuss. I doubt very much whether it did; but the fact was that they proceeded, either under the law or without the law, to make these extensive improvements and to levy these very onerous taxes, as the Senator from Delaware well says; for in many instances the tax upon outlying unimproved property was almost equal to its value at the time the improvements were made.

The object of the committee, which has devoted a great deal of time to the bill, was to begin right back in 1871, when these taxes were first levied, when these improvements were first made, and provide for reassessing and readjusting, as well as the commissioners can at this time, the taxes levied for these improvements; that is, to adjust now as near as they can, with the evidence they have before them, what the improvements were actually worth at the time and to assess against the property only what the improvements cost, and then to charge the District of Columbia two-thirds of the tax and the abutting and adjoining property one-third, as the law now is.

There were about $7,000,000 altogether I think of assessments made. Three-fifths of that amount has been paid. My friend [Mr. ROLLINS] thinks $5,000,000 will cover the total amount. My recollection is that the amount is about $7,000,000. Whatever it is, three-fifths of the amount has been paid. Two-fifths of the amount remains unpaid, generally due from wealthy people, large property-holders. The poorer people, the small property-holders, have nearly all paid, and I fancy in almost one-half of the cases they have paid excessively. This bill authorizes the District commissioners to give the people who have paid these excessive rates a drawback, to which they are certainly entitled, because, as I said before, in many instances they have paid almost as much as their property was worth at the time. The bill therefore proposes to authorize the commissioners to readjust the tax so that those who have not paid shall pay the readjusted amount, whatever that may be, to be arrived at by the commissioners.

That I think is about the scope of the bill. In other particulars there may be some important points to which I have not alluded, but that is the general scope of it.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator from Arkansas very rightly supposes that I do not understand the scope and effect of the bill, and that was the reason why I asked for an explanation of it. The facts stated, substantially, I believe, are these, and the warrant for the statement is partly to be found in the admissions of the Senator who has just taken his seat: in 1871 the board of public works of this District, as the Senator truly says, either with or without law, and as it seems in most cases without law, projected a scheme of improvement all over this city and District entirely out of proportion to the means of the inhabitants or to the rational expectation of return of the cost by taxation. Assessments were levied for those improvements. The improvements not being warranted by law, they were resisted by the property-owners, and the collection of those taxes has been successfully resisted until this time. The present proposition is that the assessments so made may be revised, but that the work which was done without authority of law, and ordered without authority of law, shall be confirmed. Why, sir, it strikes me that is giving up—

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me a moment?

Mr. BAYARD. Pardon me a moment. There was, as I said, a most extensive system of improvements which was not warranted by law; that is to say expensive and extensive avenues were ordered to be run through lands where there was no population, no habitation, no improvement that warranted it. The owners of those lands were then assessed, and the taxes were sought to be collected. They resisted the collection of the taxes upon the ground that the improvements were not authorized by law, and I believe they have been successful in establishing that proposition. Now, the present proposition is to legalize anew those improvements which were not legal at the time they were ordered.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator will allow me—

Mr. BAYARD. I will first state my proposition.

Mr. HARRIS. It is upon this precise point that I wanted to say to the Senator from Delaware that the bill which he holds in his hand legalizes no assessment that has been made in the District of Columbia heretofore or now.

Mr. BAYARD. But it proposes to legalize an improvement made without authority, which was the subject of assessment.

Mr. HARRIS. Again I beg to assure the Senator from Delaware that the bill is not intended to and does not accomplish that object.

There are two classes of objections to the assessments heretofore made. One class is assessments that were wholly unauthorized by law; the other is where the assessment was authorized by law but was excessive. This bill makes it the duty of the commissioners to re-examine all the assessments that have been made and correct them, not only as to those that were illegal in the beginning but those that were authorized by law but were excessive in amount.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask the Senator does the present bill attempt to legalize the action of the board of public works in ordering the improvements to be made?

Mr. HARRIS. In nothing; to legalize no action of the board of public works; but so far as the acts of the board of public works were legal and binding it proposes to correct assessments that were made upon the work performed by the board of public works; but this bill does not legalize a single act of theirs, either where the assessment was authorized by law or where it was not authorized by law.

Mr. BAYARD. If I understand the Senator, then, the present bill in no way legalizes the action of the board of public works in authorizing improvements which were not based upon some law. Suppose, therefore, if I may state the case, a property had been opened and these expensive streets had been extended to it without authority of law for which assessments were laid upon the property-owners adjacent, does this bill affect those assessments or does it order a new assessment that shall still become a lien on that property?

Mr. HARRIS. This bill is intended to authorize the commissioners to re-examine all the assessments heretofore made. If they find that an assessment that has been heretofore made was wholly unauthorized by law, it does not authorize them to assess that property at all. If they find that an assessment has been authorized by law and has been made but is unjust because excessive, it is their duty to correct it. If they find that an error has been committed against the District by the assessment being too low, lower than it ought to have been, it is their duty to correct that error. But I will say to the Senator that when they have re-examined and reassessed, every citizen has a right to appeal from their decision to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and this bill makes it the duty of that court to advance those causes upon its docket and hear them at the earliest moment it can with justice to parties.

Mr. BAYARD. Does that appeal lie from the decision of the commissioners as to the legality or illegality of the original improvement?

Mr. HARRIS. Yes, sir, as to all questions involved, the right to make the assessment originally and as to its amount. As to the suits that are pending, the Senator will find that the very last thing in the bill is a proviso that nothing in this bill shall be so construed as to affect the rights of the parties in those suits, but it leaves them to carry on their litigation before the courts in their own way and the courts will decide it hereafter.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I wish to ask a question. Suppose property has been assessed too much and that fact is ascertained and the tax has been paid, does this bill provide for refunding that money?

Mr. HARRIS. A drawback is allowed, which is available in abatement of any taxes assessed.

Mr. ROLLINS. I desire to move a slight amendment. In the second section, line 21, I move to strike out "it" and insert "them," and at the end of the last line of the section, line 22, to strike out "them" and insert "said commissioners."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before we take any action on any amendments—

Mr. ROLLINS. These are merely verbal.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I presume they are all right in themselves; but I should like to call the attention of the Senate to one or two things about this business. I am one of the unfortunate people in this District in front of whose little house and lot a big canal was dug, for the purpose of general improvement I suppose, and I was called upon to pay for it. I resisted, and so did all my neighbors, because the old act provided, the act of the Legislative Assembly or the act of Congress, provided that the injury as well as the benefit should be taken into account, and I contended, as I thought with considerable force and rightfully, that the injury to me was five or six times, perhaps ten times, as great as the benefit that was conferred. I therefore respectfully submitted to the board of public works that the balance was quite the other way. After a great deal of fuss, and to avoid having a lawsuit to get the balance because I could not exactly see the fund out of which I was to get the balance, a compromise was effected and the matter so far as I am concerned, and I presume all the neighbors along there, was settled by mutual consent, and the amount of suffering that I and my neighbors have borne, therefore, has been condoned and ended; so that I suppose so far as I am concerned and I dare say the other people in that block where this enormous outrage was perpetrated, we have nothing at this present moment to complain of, nor could the commissioners probably under this bill reinvestigate the matter and do any of us justice because we have consented to a settlement and an adjustment.

Now let us come to what this bill in the main proposes to do. It proposes by the first section to have a reassessment made—that is what it says—upon all the property on all the streets where these improvements were carried on, a distance I am told of one hundred and sixteen miles or so, which doubling so as to cover the property on both sides, would make two hundred and thirty-two miles of frontage. Taking twenty-five feet as the ordinary frontage of a lot in this town, you will get more than forty thousand separate lots. Some people of course have double lots, triple lots possibly, some perhaps have squares where lots have not been laid off. Making all allowance for that, and there will be from ten to twenty thousand probably at the very least—we ought to know it from the statistics, from the books of the District—ten or twenty thousand separate cases for investigation. It is a reassessment of the whole thing from top to bottom. Now, it is stated that three-fifths of these people have ended their affairs, some by composition as in the case I have referred to and others by payment. Some have brought suits to protect themselves; some have not.

Now you propose by this bill to open the whole subject from the beginning, and to have a readjustment over the whole city of the entire subject; and if it turns out that there is a balance due to anybody, as undoubtedly there would be in a great many instances if justice is done, that is to be paid out of the general fund, provided you cannot get it out of the people, who have not paid anything or who ought to pay more. If the people who have not paid anything or who ought to pay more, when this bill has passed and been gone through, act as they have done hitherto, those who have resisted, you will not get any money out of them until the end of a lawsuit. The consequence is, therefore, that you begin by an enterprise which is necessarily either to increase the taxation of the District or to increase its debt, one or the other. I do not intend to go into the question as to the wisdom and good conduct of the board of public works; whatever of misfortune there was about it is done and gone by; but I say that the inevitable consequence of this bill is either to increase the taxation on the already overburdened tax-payers of the District for the general fund, or to increase its debt, neither of which propositions is in my opinion at all tolerable.

In the next place, as I have already said, and I wish to repeat it, it seems to me to be an unnecessary and useless piece of legislation to undertake to overhaul and retry, after a period of six years or so, the question of whether an assessment was excessive or not excessive on a particular lot. It is too long ago, it has gone by, it has been settled and paid or composed in some way; and yet this bill purports to reopen the whole question. I think it is much better for the public interests of this District, much better for private interests taken as a whole, to let what has been accomplished and is finished by the payment of assessments or by settlement, stay. Injustice undoubtedly has been done in particular cases, a great many of them; but the trouble is that there is no fund out of which this injustice can be corrected, and it is extremely difficult after this length of time to go back for six years and take into view the exact circumstances, the benefits and the disadvantages as they existed at that time. It is better, therefore, in my opinion, that the people who have suffered should bear their suffering as it has gone by, than it is to reopen for litigation and dispute in the supreme court of the District by appeal every one of these ten or twenty thousand assessments. It is a good deal like many of the misfortunes that have happened in this country in the last fifteen years. A great many things were done that were done wrongly. Injustice was done on all sides and in all sorts of ways. The only thing we can do about it after this lapse of time is to do nothing. Let it go.

In my opinion, the bill is altogether too broad for the chief object that it has in view; and that is apparently to compel the people who have not paid and who are resisting either by their silence and omission or by active steps in the courts, to pay the assessments that were made as they shall be corrected. In what attitude do they stand with that provision, be it legal or illegal? The old provision was that when these assessments were made, if they were not paid within a certain length of time, the proper authorities should issue what is called a tax certificate, a special-tax assessment setting forth that the particular property in question was chargeable with so much money. That certificate I suppose was paid to the contractor who had done the work, and he sold it to somebody who bought it and raised money on it. That certificate is either a legal lien on that property, or it is not. If it is not a legal lien, the gentlemen in charge of this bill say they do not intend to make it a legal lien. They say, in response to the Senator from Delaware, "we do not propose by this bill to legalize anything that is not now legal; we do not propose to create any obligation on the part of the person who has not paid this assessment to pay, it that does not exist now; we only propose to find out whether that particular assessment has been excessive in point of the amount overcharged; if it is overcharged we propose to reduce it and get the money somewhere, either out of the general fund, or out of assessments where there was an undercharge to pay it."

Well, Mr. President, if these certificates are not now legal and binding, and the bill bears the construction that they say it does, which I doubt, or that they think it does, which I doubt, then when you have gone through with this reassessment, you leave it exactly where it was before.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. SARGENT. I suggest that the bill under consideration had better go over. The important statement made in reference to it by the Senator from Vermont leads me to desire to examine the bill, and I certainly am not prepared to vote on it to-day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us go to the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired, and the Calendar now comes up under the regular order.

Mr. ROLLINS. I desire to ask the Senate to consider this bill to-morrow. It is very important that an early decision should be reached with regard to it. If the bill is not to be passed, some other measure should be proposed for the purpose of adjusting these special-improvement taxes, and if this bill is to be passed it should be passed at once. No progress whatever is being made in the adjustment of these matters. They are of great importance to the city, and I think the bill should receive early consideration at the hands of the Senate, and I ask, if it go over now, that it may be considered to-morrow.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You can give notice.

Mr. ALLISON. Before we pass from this bill, I want simply to concur in the statement made by the Senator from Vermont. Whatever else we may do with these old taxes in this District, I think we never should undertake to reassess the cost of these improvements. It cannot be done in two years and done justly. It has been tried two or three times, first by the board of public works, next by the board of audit, and to undertake that work now will simply be to render "confusion worse confounded." It cannot be done.

Mr. ROLLINS. The Senator will allow me just a moment.

Mr. McMILLAN. I call for the regular order.

Mr. DORSEY. I hope we shall not be shut off in that way.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have the floor if any speeches are to be made. I have a good deal to say yet.

Mr. ROLLINS. I seldom trouble the Senate with any remarks. I ask but a moment to reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa. This work has been already very largely accomplished, and in a very few months it can be completed. This revision has been going on for months, and the clerical work is largely accomplished.

Mr. ALLISON. May I ask the Senator a question in relation to this bill?

Mr. ROLLINS. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I see this bill provides for the assessment of sewer taxes. Of course I do not remember the exact details with reference to the action of 1873 and 1874, but my recollection is that the cost of those sewers has been paid out of the treasury of the District of Columbia through the 3.65 bonds, and now we are to ascertain the cost of that. How is that cost to be ascertained? Are we to take the par of the 3.65 bonds that were issued, or are we to take the cash value of those improvements at that time? It seems to me that it will be almost impossible to get at the accurate cost of these improvements.

Mr. DORSEY. The Senator is entirely mistaken.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If anybody is to have the floor on this question I want to finish my speech.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont is entitled to the floor on this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Chair had kindly given me the floor to make some observations.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The regular order has been called for by the Senator from Minnesota.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont holds the floor.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I demand the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont holds the floor. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. BURNSIDE. Under the ruling, a Senator can be taken from the floor by a demand for the regular order in the midst of a speech. That can be done under a ruling here some two weeks ago; and I demand the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island objects to the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I object to the further consideration of this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Can I address the Chair? I want to speak to the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont speaks to the point of order raised by the Senator from Rhode Island. The Senator from Rhode Island has raised a point of order.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I call for the regular order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I rise to a point of order on that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont will state the point of order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I state my point of order to be this: that by a standing order of the Senate, when one o'clock was reached, this bill went over, and that the Calendar in its regular order is in order. I think that is a good point and it coincides with what my friend from Rhode Island wishes.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I demand that we proceed with the consideration of the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first case on the Calendar at the point where it was left off yesterday will be laid before the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to give notice that I will offer an amendment to the bill that has just gone over. While I do not think this bill can be properly construed into legalizing any of the acts or assessments of the board of public works, to put it beyond the possibility of any such construction, I propose in line 3 of section 2 to amend by inserting after the word "all" the words "heretofore legally authorized."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator gives notice of an amendment. The Calendar will be called in order.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1968) to provide for vessels of the United States hailing from places where they are owned or built;

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the resolution of the Senate for the printing of 10,500 copies of the report of the Smithsonian Institution for the year 1877.

The message further announced that the House had concurred in some and non-concurred in other amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3822) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 15) to alter and amend the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and also to alter and amend the act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, in amendment of said first-named act;

A bill (S. No. 767) authorizing the Secretary of War to allow the interment in the national cemetery at New Berne, in the State of North Carolina, of the remains of the late R. F. Lehman, late a commissioner of the United States circuit court in the eastern district of North Carolina.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 120) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the Canadian-built propeller East, by the name of Kent;

A bill (S. No. 870) granting a pension to Rebecca and Augusta Miller, daughters of Brigadier-General James Miller, of the war of 1812;

A bill (S. No. 1045) to provide for the administration of the oath of office to collectors and other officers of the customs in the district of Alaska;

A bill (H. R. 2818) to authorize T. and J. W. Gaff & Co. to use a certain building in the city of Aurora, Indiana, for the rectification of distilled spirits; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4394) to prohibit the coinage of the twenty-cent piece of silver.

AUSTIN-TOPOLOVAMPO PACIFIC ROUTE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first bill on the Calendar at the point where its consideration was stopped yesterday is the bill (S. No. 213) to survey the Austin-Topolovampo Pacific route.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That may go over, Mr. President, under the circumstances.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

THE MILITIA.

Mr. COKE. Senate bill No. 104, relative to the militia, was made a special order some time ago, and I ask that it be again made a special order for next Thursday.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No special orders. We ought not to have special orders.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas moves that this bill be made the special order for Thursday next.

The question being put, the Chair declared that the yeas appeared to prevail.

Mr. COKE. I ask for a division.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 21, yeas 12; no quorum voting.

Mr. BLAINE. Let the bill be read. Let us know what it is.

The Chief Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not know any more about it now than I did before.

Mr. ALLISON. It is a bill providing for a million of dollars for supplying arms, &c., to the militia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Texas to make the bill the special order for Thursday next.

Mr. BLAINE. The merits of the bill I suppose are not debatable on the question of making it a special order; but I wish to ask the honorable Senator from Texas what is the exigency for making this a special order just now.

Mr. COKE. The day has passed which was fixed for the consideration of the bill. The Senate determined to take up the Calendar and go through it regularly. This bill has lost its place on the Calendar and I desire simply to move forward the day when it shall be taken under consideration. The bill is an important one.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will it not have its place at the foot of the Calendar, having gone over?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is on the Calendar all the time. The Senator can move to take it up at any time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is subject to the order of the Senate.

Mr. BLAINE. In the present condition of the Treasury of the United States and the taxes, I do not know that I feel like voting a million dollars for an extra supply of arms. I do not know what there is in the condition of the country that calls for it. It seems to me that making it a special order is giving some sanction on the part of the Senate to its importance and its pressing need just at this moment, which I do not feel quite prepared to do.

Mr. COKE. The importance of the bill, I will say to the Senator from Maine, I think can be demonstrated whenever it is in order to discuss the merits of the bill. At all events it is of sufficient importance to be fully discussed. I only ask now that the time be fixed when it can be considered. As it stands now, it is not on the Calendar. The day for which it was set it was taken up but not disposed of. That day has passed, and I ask that another day be appointed for the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Texas that it is on the Calendar as a special order already, but has been displaced by the Anthony rule, so called. The Senate has ordered that it proceed at one o'clock each day with cases on the Calendar, setting aside all special orders.

Mr. BLAINE. If I understand it, then, the honorable Senator would not put his bill in any better position by the order he now asks than it holds. It is in just as good a position now as it will be by the Senator's motion.

Mr. COKE. I ask what position the bill now holds on the Calendar?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It stands as a special order fixed for the day named, but it has been displaced by the order under which the Senate is now acting, namely, the Anthony rule, so called. When it is through, that will still be a special order.

Mr. COKE. What will be its condition when the Calendar is finished?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be a special order to come up unless the Senate should otherwise order.

Mr. COKE. I withdraw the motion, then.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider the action of the House of Representatives on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3822) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes.

On motion of Mr. SARGENT, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments, disagreed to by the House of Representatives to said bill, and ask a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. SARGENT, Mr. DORSEY, and Mr. BECK.

On motion of Mr. SARGENT, it was Ordered, That the bill (H. R. No. 3822) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, be printed with the action of the House of Representatives, and the amendments thereto numbered.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. PLUMB submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. No. 1103) declaring the true construction of a certain statute therein mentioned; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PLUMB submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 4236) to establish post-roads in the several States therein named; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING OF A MEMORIAL.

Mr. MITCHELL. On the 18th of the present month a memorial of the Missouri and Niobrara Railroad Company, praying the passage of a law authorizing the President of the United States to designate that company to construct the north branch of the Union Pacific Railroad as provided for by the act of July 2, 1864, was presented to the Senate and referred to the Committee on Railroads. It has not been printed. I now move in behalf of the Committee on Railroads that the Senate grant an order to print the petition.

The motion was agreed to.

TIMBER LANDS ON PACIFIC SLOPE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bills on the Calendar will be proceeded with.

The bill (S. No. 926) for the sale of timber lands in the States of California and Oregon and in Washington Territory was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment striking out in line 18 of section 4 the words "one year" and inserting "ninety days;" so as to read:

And the penalties herein provided shall not take effect until ninety days after the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. On line 4 of section 4, after the words "United States," I move to insert "in said States and Territory."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. In the first page, lines 12 and 13 of section 1, owing to this being a copy of an old bill, the words "and in all other Territories of the United States not exceeding forty acres to any one person" were inserted. I move to strike that out. This bill is confined solely to the States of Oregon and California and Washington Territory. I move to strike out all after the word "persons," in line 12 of section 1, down to and including "person," in line 13.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I offer the following amendment as an additional section:

SEC. 5. That any person prosecuted in said States and Territory for violating section 2461, of the Revised Statutes of the United States who is not prosecuted for cutting timber for export from the United States may be relieved from further prosecution and liability therefor upon payment into the court wherein said action is pending of the sum of $2.50 per acre for all lands on which he shall have cut or caused to be cut timber or removed or caused to be removed the same: Provided, That nothing contained in this section shall be construed as granting to the person hereby relieved the title to said lands for said payment, but he shall have the right to purchase the same upon the same terms and conditions as other persons as provided hereinbefore in this act: And provided further, That all moneys collected under this act shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States. And section 4751 of the Revised Statutes is hereby repealed so far as it relates to the States and Territory herein named.

I will state the effect of this amendment. Persons have been arrested for cutting this timber, who I have shown, I think conclusively to the Senate as well by their petitions as by statements made on the floor of the Senate of my own knowledge, who are pursuing an industry that is absolutely necessary to carry on mining, farming, &c., in the mining regions. Large portions of California and Nevada and a part of Utah would have to be depopulated and mining stopped unless this industry can go on. These persons tried in several ways to buy the land of the Government; but the Government, under the impression that this land two, three, four, five, six, or nine thousand feet in the region of perpetual frost might be taken up under the pre-emption and homestead laws, neglected to provide any means by which the land could be bought. Although this bill has substantially passed the House on two occasions and the Senate on one occasion, the two Houses never united and acted together at the same Congress. The parties endeavored to buy the land by means of discharged soldiers' homesteads. They found, however, to their sorrow, that those were fraudulent although they paid their money and lost their money for them. They tried to take up the lands under the pre-emption laws, and it was ruled that it was absurd to suppose a man could take up a pre-emption claim away up in the snow line, and they were rejected because they seemed to be fraudulent on their face, and there was unquestionably a technical fraud in the matter. They have tried every way they could to obtain title. We now propose, however, that they shall not be excused for these acts, but shall pay $2.50 an acre on all land that they shall have cut one tree or a dozen trees, and that that shall not give them title to the land, but after that they shall have the privilege of buying the land on the same terms that any one else can at $2.50 an acre, so that the Government gets for its land $5 an acre and they can only be relieved from prosecution by paying this amount. Although the land has been stripped the Government nevertheless gets its price for it and a fair large price for the land. This seemed to be an equitable settlement, and therefore I have suggested the amendment with the concurrence of the Pacific coast delegation in the two Houses who have carefully considered the matter. I ask for the adoption of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask the Senator from California if there should not be some provision like this:

That all acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. SARGENT. I have no objection to that, although perhaps it is unnecessary. Repeal all other laws so far as they conflict with this act.

Mr. MITCHELL. I offer this amendment, to come in at the end of the bill:

Provided, That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RANK OF SENIOR INSPECTOR-GENERAL.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 824) establishing the rank of the senior inspector-general; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that hereafter the rank of the senior inspector-general of the United States Army shall be brigadier-general; but no pay or allowances shall be made to him other than from the date of appointment under the act.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, to add the following proviso:

And provided, That nothing herein enacted shall authorize any increase in the number or the rank of the other officers of the Inspector-General's Department, as fixed by the first section of the act of June 23, 1874.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Let the report be read.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Perhaps I can save the time of the Senate. The report is of considerable length, and I do not suppose that all the members of the Senate desire to hear it read. I will say that this bill passed the Military Committee unanimously as amended, that it makes the grade of the senior inspector of the Army that of brigadier-general from the time of the passage of this bill henceforward, that it conforms in this respect to that which has been done with reference to all of the heads of the Departments of the Army. The General-in-Chief of the Army, the Secretary of War, and others in authority have recommended that such a bill pass, so that hereafter there shall be at the head of the Inspector-General's Department a person holding equal rank with those at the head of the other Departments. The bill is simply to place upon terms of equality this officer with all other officers in equal service.

I think that statement contains substantially what is in the report. In addition, I may say that the record of General Marcy is set out at some length. It is a very notable record. In nearly fifty years of service he has served twenty-seven or thirty years on the frontier and in Mexico during the late war. The testimony in his behalf as a man, as an officer, is equal to that given to any other officer I presume; but the Military Committee base their action not upon the meritorious service of General Marcy but upon the fact that the head of this Department should hold an equal rank with the heads of all the other Departments of the Army, this being up to this time the exception.

Mr. McMILLAN. May I ask the Senator from New Jersey whether this bill increases the pay or increases the duties of the officer in any respect?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Not the duties that I am aware of. It will increase the pay perhaps to the extent of the difference between the pay now given to him as a colonel and that which he would receive as a brigadier-general, just as in all other cases.

Mr. McMILLAN. It increases the pay with the rank?

Mr. RANDOLPH. The pay with the rank. It has been done, as I have said, in the case of every other head of a department of the Army.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN H. EVANS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1385) for the relief of the minor heirs of John H. Evans, deceased; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for paying to the minor heirs of John H. Evans, deceased, late of McNairy County, Tennessee, the pay and bounty due him as if he had been enlisted and mustered into the service of the United States on the 6th of July, 1863.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE MARIETTA REUNION.

The next business on the Calendar was the joint resolution (H. R. No. 78) granting the use of artillery, tents, &c., at the national soldiers and sailors' reunion to be held at Marietta, Ohio; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SENECA LANDS IN NEW YORK.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 690) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Seneca Nation of New York Indians to lease lands within the Cattaraugus and Allegany reservations, and to confirm existing leases," approved February 19, 1875.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Had not that better be passed over? I know nothing about it, but the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] is not here, and it is presented with an amendment, I see.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over.

TESTIMONY IN CASES OF PRIVATE CLAIMS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 43) providing for taking testimony and collecting information to be used by Congress; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That any committee of either House of Congress, before which any private claim against the United States may at any time be pending, being first thereto authorized by the House appointing them, may order testimony to be taken, and books and papers to be examined, and copies thereof proved, before any standing master in chancery of the circuit of the United States within the judicial district where such testimony or evidence is to be taken. Such master in chancery, upon receiving a copy of the order of such committee, signed by its chairman, setting forth the time and place, when and where such examination is to be had, the questions to be investigated, and, so far as may be known to the committee, the names of the witnesses to be examined on the part of the United States, and the general nature of the books, papers, and documents to be proved, if known, shall proceed to give to such private parties reasonable notice of the time and place of such examination, unless such notice shall have been or shall be given by such committee or its chairman, or by the attorney or agent of the United States, or waived by such private party. And such master shall issue subpoenas for such witnesses as may have been named in the order of such committee and such others as the agent or other representative of the United States hereinafter mentioned shall request. And he shall also issue subpoenas at the request of such private party or parties for such witnesses within such judicial district as they may desire: Provided, That the United States shall not be liable for the fees of any officer for serving any subpoena for any private party, nor for the fees of any witness on behalf of such party. Said committee may inform the district attorney of the United States for the district where the testimony is to be taken of the time, place, and object of such examination, and request his attendance in behalf of the Government in conducting such examination, in which case it shall be his duty to attend in person, or by an assistant employed by him, to conduct such examination on the part of the United States, or such committee may, at its option, appoint an agent or attorney, or one of its own members for that purpose, as they may deem best; and in that event, if the committee shall not be unanimous, the minority of the committee may also appoint such agent or attorney or member of such committee to attend and take part in such examination.

Sec. 2. It shall be the duty of the marshal of the United States for the district in which the testimony is to be taken to serve, or cause to be served, all subpoenas issued in behalf of the United States under this act, in the same manner as if issued by the circuit court for his district; and he shall, upon being first paid his fees therefor, serve any subpoenas that may be issued at the instance of such private party or parties. And the said master may, in his discretion, appoint any other person to serve any subpoena. Such master shall have full power to administer oaths to witnesses, and the same power to issue attachments to compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents, as the circuit or district court of his district would have in a case pending before it; and it shall be his duty to report the conduct of contumacious witnesses before him to the House of Congress appointing such committee. The compensation of such master in chancery, and of marshals and deputy marshals, and of any person appointed to serve papers, shall be the same as for like services in equity cases in the circuit court of the United States; and the compensation of witnesses shall be the same as for like attendance and travel of witnesses before such circuit courts; and all such fees and compensation of officers and witnesses on behalf of the United States, and other expenses of all investigations which may be had under the provisions of this act on the part of the United States, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the branch of Congress appointing such committee. Said master, when the examination is concluded, shall attach together all the depositions and exhibits, and attach thereto his certificate setting forth or referring to the authority by which they were taken, any notices he may have given, the names of the witnesses for whom subpoenas or attachments were issued, the names of witnesses who attended, with the time of attendance and mileage and fees of each witness on behalf of the United States, which he may require to be shown by affidavit, his own fees, the fees of the marshal, his deputies or other persons serving papers, giving the items, and such other facts in relation to the circumstances connected with the taking of the depositions as he may deem material. He shall then seal up such depositions and papers securely, direct them to the chairman of such committee at Washington, stating briefly on the outside the nature of the contents, and place the same in the post-office, paying the postage thereon; and said package shall be opened only in the presence of such committee. The chairman of any committee ordering testimony to be taken under this act shall, at least ten days before the time fixed for such examination, and within two days after the adoption of such order, cause a copy thereof to be directed and delivered to the Attorney-General of the United States, or sent to him by mail at the Department of Justice, to enable him to give such instructions as he may deem best to the district attorney of the district where such testimony is to be taken, who may, and, if required by the Attorney-General, shall, though not requested by the committee, appear for the United States in person or by assistant, and take such part in such examination as the Attorney-General shall direct.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for taking testimony to be used before Congress in cases of private claims against the United States."

THOMAS H. HALSEY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 337) for the relief of Thomas H. Halsey, paymaster United States Army; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Military Affairs reported an amendment to fill the blank by inserting "$1,788;" so as to make the bill read:

That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury are authorized and directed to credit to the account of Thomas H. Halsey, paymaster United States Army, the sum of $1,788, being the amount charged against him, and embezzled by the forgeries of his clerk, William F. Piper.

Mr. MORRILL. I have just read the report, and I have no doubt of the propriety of the passage of the act; but I wish to say one thing that does not appear in the report: that since the introduction of the bill Major Halsey has deceased, and he leaves no estate. The only effect of the passage of the bill will be to remove his name from among the list of defaulters. The fact that he attended to his duties faithfully and that this $1,788 deficiency was caused by no negligence of his is sufficiently apparent from the report.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Let the report be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. McMillan on the 3d instant:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 337) for the relief of Thomas H. Halsey, paymaster, United States Army, have considered the same, and submit the following report:

A similar bill for the relief of the claimant, Thomas H. Halsey, was presented to the Senate at the second session of the Forty-fourth Congress, and the Committee on Claims, to whom the bill was referred, reported the same back at the same session, (report 630,) inserting the sum of $1,788 in the bill, and recommended its passage. The bill passed the Senate. The report of the former committee contains a full and accurate statement of the facts in the case, and our views and conclusions are fully expressed therein. We therefore adopt the report of that committee as our report and recommendation in this case.

The report is as follows:

"Halsey is a paymaster in the United States Army, and has been for a number of years. William F. Piper became his clerk in 1863, and it seems as recommended very highly for capacity and integrity. This paymaster was ordered to San Francisco in 1868, and took Piper with him. During 1869 Halsey's health was very poor, so much so that at times it was impossible for him to be at his office. Having confidence in this clerk, who had given no cause for the least suspicion of his integrity, he left him in charge of his funds when unable to be present, and upon him devolved the duty of making payments and taking the proper vouchers, though usually the payments were made by Halsey in person. It seems that while only two vouchers were necessary, one to be retained by the paymaster and the other to be sent to Washington, yet Piper probably had these vouchers signed by the holders to whom he made payment; then, having access to the true voucher or that retained by the paymaster, destroyed it and changed the amount stated in the other two by forgery, so as to show a payment larger than that actually paid the person or persons signing the same. Thus, for instance, when the amount paid was, and the true voucher stated it to be, $53, he would raise it to $153, showing a payment of $100 more than the true amount. These forgeries were so skillful or so well executed that some of them passed through the Department at Washington without being discovered. All this time Halsey had neither knowledge nor suspicion of what was going on. These alterations were all made between May, 1869, and January, 1870. Piper absconded in February, 1870, before there was any knowledge of his frauds, and has not since been found, though an effort has been made to ascertain his whereabouts.

"It seems that Halsey was dismissed the service, but after this order, upon the report of a board of officers exonerating him from the most material imputations touching these frauds, he was restored to the service, and is still engaged therein. This was done in March, 1870. The vouchers thus raised were in number twenty-five, and the forgeries amounted to $1,788; that is, as charged, they showed payments to this amount over and above what was actually disbursed. These forgeries were not upon the vouchers in consecutive order, nor did they occur every month of the time covered, for we find that the frauds were confined to May, June, November, and December, 1869, and January, 1870, and their numbers are from 322 to 975, being, as already said, twenty-five in number.

"Your committee referred this bill to the proper department, and, in addition to the information already given, we have the following from the office of the Paymaster-General:

"The forgeries consisted in 'raised vouchers' by one W. F. Piper, Major Halsey's clerk, while he was stationed in San Francisco, from May, 1869, to January, 1870, altering the final statements of discharged soldiers so they would call for more than they were entitled to, he pocketing the difference. For instance, if the true statement called for $53 retained pay, he would, by forgeries, make it read $153, giving the soldier the right amount, but appropriating to his own use the $100. Piper absconded from San Francisco before the crime was known, and diligent attempts to cause his arrest have been unsuccessful.

"Mr. Piper, Major Halsey says, had been with him seven years, during which time his standing and reputation were very good. I knew myself that his standing in New York as paymaster's clerk, in 1866, was very good, being in contact with him more or less for several months.

"It appears from the statement of Major Halsey, confirmed by other information in this office, that Major Halsey, although in poor health, continued to discharge his duties as paymaster, and, on account of the state of his health, placed more of the duties in the hands of his clerk than is usual with paymasters. It was the laudable ambition of Major Halsey not to surrender to his disease; not to give up his official duties. He placed money in his hands to make such payment, and hence the opportunity of this clerk to commit the crime.

"I am well aware that by strict principles of law the officer is held for the amount of any public funds feloniously taken from him, even when there has been no fault or negligence on his part, and that he is likewise, in strict law, held responsible for the derelictions of his clerk; but after the late war, in which such large disbursements were made with comparatively small loss to the Government, and in which disbursing officers had been compelled to incur such extraordinary hazards from robbery and other accidents, a law was passed, approved June 23, 1870, providing that the accounting officers could, in reference to disbursements prior to August 20, 1866, 'allow such credit for losses of funds, vouchers, and property as they may deem just and reasonable.' This was enlightened policy in Congress, and in thus relaxing the severity of abstract law toward disbursing officers real justice and equity were meted out to many meritorious officers. I think that the case of Major Halsey is of a similar character. Prior to the 1st of January, 1870, he had disbursed, since his first appointment, $6,384,125, and he has been an industrious, vigorous, and faithful officer.

"Upon these facts your committee are of opinion that if relief should be granted to any one in this class of cases it should be in this, of course we do not pretend that this paymaster is not, in strict law, to be held for this money. It is true, however, that none the least negligence can be imputed to him. He seems to have been a most excellent, faithful, and honest officer. No suspicion whatever attaches to any single act of his long official life. He had a right to rely upon the integrity of this clerk. Such clerk was necessary to assist in the discharge of the duties of his office. Of course in law he is to be held responsible for the faithful discharge of his duties, and by the same law must respond for any losses sustained by the Government from his peculations and frauds touching the funds intrusted to him; but the Government has not always stood up to this rule in dealing with its officers. We have relieved from losses by fire, by flood, by the thefts of third persons, and by the dishonesty of subordinates. Numberless cases are to be found in the statutes where this has been done; and while we would not sanction such relief except in the very clearest cases, we are yet of the opinion that instances may occur, as they have heretofore, where it would be the grossest injustice to hold a party to the strict terms of his obligation or undertaking.

"Believing that this is a case which is so persuasive in its equities as to justify exceptional interference, we report this bill back and recommend its passage, with an amendment, filling the blank in the fifth line with '$1,788.'

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WORKMEN AT POVERTY ISLAND LIGHT-HOUSE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 622) for the relief of workmen employed in the construction of the Poverty Island light-house, Lake Michigan.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I reported the bill the title of which has just been read from the Committee on Claims adversely, according to my recollection.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have the report before me, and recollect that it was reported adversely, and the report recommends the indefinite postponement of the bill. It is a mistake in the Calendar. I have the report lying here before me. The bill ought to be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question on the indefinite postponement of the bill.

The motion to postpone indefinitely was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair) subsequently said: While I was occupying the chair, the bill (H. R. No. 622) for the relief of workmen employed in the construction of Poverty Island light-house, Lake Michigan, was indefinitely postponed. I move that the vote indefinitely postponing the bill be reconsidered. I want the bill placed on the Calendar.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

JOHN ETZELL.

The bill (S. No. 889) granting a pension to John Etzell was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for placing on the pension-roll the name of John Etzell, late a private in Company B, Second Minnesota Regiment Infantry.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GIBBES & CO.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 288) for the relief of Gibbes & Co., of Charleston, South Carolina; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Messrs. Gibbes & Co., of Charleston, South Carolina, $4,576.92, being a balance due them on account of money deposited by them with the Secretary of the Treasury.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT METROPOLITAN POLICE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 319) for the relief of the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The preamble recites that Congress, by joint resolution of the 28th of February, 1867, granted to certain employes of the Government 20 per cent. additional compensation; that the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia were, by adverse rulings of the Departments, deprived of their portion; and that, by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in the cases known as the "20 per cent. cases," it is settled that they were clearly entitled to the benefits of the joint resolution. The bill therefore directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department to allow, and pay, to each of such persons who were officers, clerks, and employes of the Metropolitan police force on the 28th of February, 1867, a sum equal to 20 per cent. on the salary of such persons, for the time stated in the resolution.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

E. ROUFF.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 1031) for the relief of the estate of E. Rouff; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment of $45, without interest, to the administrator of the estate of E. Rouff, deceased, upon producing proper evidence of qualification as administrator of his estate, for rent of store-room in Lavaca, Texas, used for storing commissary stores from September 1, 1865, to October 31, 1865, occupied under contract with Rouff, and for which rent vouchers properly signed, certified, and reported by the proper quartermaster were given.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3740) to provide for deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

HORACE A. STONE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 478) authorizing the Commissioner of Patents to extend the patent of Horace A. Stone for improvement in the manufacture of cheese; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask for the reading of the report in that case.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. MORGAN on the 4th instant:

The Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 478) authorizing the Commissioner of Patents to extend the patent to Horace A. Stone for improvement in the manufacture of cheese, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

It appears that Horace A. Stone, of Michigan, obtained a patent on the 26th of March, 1861, running seventeen years, for a new process for making cheese, but, owing to ill-health and some infringements made upon said patent by his own agent, the process has never been much used, and he has consequently never received any profit of consequence from his said invention, and therefore asks an extension of seven years.

The process consists of cheese-making without pressure or weights, and is done by the use of a perforated hoop of tin or sheet-iron, being perforated on the top, bottom, and sides, and the cheese is made by settling in the hoop in three or four days.

If there is any virtue in the process, it will tend to cheapen the article as well as enrich it. There is no probability that the extension can prejudice the public. Your committee therefore recommend that the bill pass.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to record my vote against this bill; I vote against all these things. There is no equity, justice, or propriety in granting an extension for seven years to this man who has had a patent now for seventeen years.

Mr. MORGAN. If Congress see fit to stop now and establish the precedent that no man shall ever have an extension, I shall very cheerfully concur in that view; but it has not done so. Several patents have been extended. If there can be a meritorious case at all, there is merit in this case. I do not esteem this patent as being one of great value. It is not one that has gone into general use at all; but there are several persons who have used it. This man after getting his patent was sick and for many years was bed-ridden and dependent on the charity of a grown daughter for his support. During the time of his sickness this patent was pirated really by his own agent. He got a little income from it afterward, about $500 a year. Now he is in an infirm state of health. That being the only reliance the man has for support in the world, he asks the Congress of the United States to give him the benefit of his invention for a longer period of time. It cannot do the country any harm. It is a beneficence to him. When you deny him this extension, you take from him all that he relies upon for a living, according to the evidence brought to the attention of the committee.

I do not concur in the position that no patentee is entitled to an extension of his patent under any circumstances. It is a property guaranteed to him under the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the United States, and there are cases where exceptions ought to be made. There are several cases pending now, and I think if they were brought to the attention of the Senate they would be considered exceptions to the doctrine as to the extension of patents which is generally held. Unless, indeed, the Senate now intends to stop and make a rule which is hereafter to be followed and which will amount to an instruction to the Committee on Patents that it must bring no more cases of extension here, I think it is not proper to apply a harsh rule in this case.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I vote for the bill because the committee have examined and recommended it.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

A division being called for on the passage of the bill, the yeas were 22 and the nays 6; no quorum voting.

Mr. BECK and Mr. SARGENT called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. MERRIMON. I should like to do this party justice, and while I am inclined now to vote against the bill, because I am against the extension of patents generally, I should like to hear the gentleman in charge of the bill give some explanation of its merits.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] has just made an explanation.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am sorry I could not hear him.

Mr. KERNAN. I am on this Patent Committee, and it is a very laborious committee. I do not mean to say that if Congress were to take up the question, I would not vote for a law which should declare that a patentee should have a certain time and that there should be no renewal.

Several SENATORS. That is the law now.

Mr. KERNAN. No, the statute-book is full of laws allowing extensions. When a man by a mistake or some misfortune does not receive remuneration, he comes, according to the uniform practice in exceptional cases, to get an opportunity to comply out of time. All I mean to say is that I do not think the members of that committee are strenuous at all that there should be any such thing as extending patents. If Congress will only say to all patentees and all those who are hereafter to become patentees, that there shall be but a limited period fixed by the law, be it so. But as that is not the law now, that committee would be deemed very derelict to duty if they did not hear each man and see if there were equitable reasons why he should be relieved. We have no way but to bring the subject before the Senate, present the case, and let the Senate say whether it is within the line they have established, where they will authorize a party to go again before the Commissioner. I should be very glad to have this subject taken up, because a good many of these needy patentees, sometimes by the fraud of somebody, have not had a chance to get the benefit of their invention. For various reasons in many cases they have not reaped the benefit of their invention, and they have come before the committee and spent a good deal of time and money in laying before the committee the merits of their cases; and when the committee with great labor, rejecting all that they think have not very exceptional reasons for being reported favorably, come here with a favorable report, it is said, "We are against all extensions." If we are, let us settle the question by a law that will relieve the committee from all this labor, relieve the inventors from all the expense of presenting evidence and attending to try to persuade the committee.

I say this, having no feeling except that, while the law is as it now is, we should not say that we are against all extensions. That may be a wise policy, and I do not say now it is not; I do not say whether upon examination I would not favor giving them a definite period and declaring by a law, which I would ask Congress to stand up to, that there should never be an extension.

I do not mean to find the least fault with those who say they will vote against all extensions. I only say this to call the attention of Senators to the subject, especially of those who think we had better not extend patents at all. Let there be a vote, and if we find that is the view of a majority, let us make a general law and relieve everybody from what is a very laborious duty to Congress and its committees and a very expensive thing to these inventors.

Mr. COCKRELL. Do I understand the Senator from New York to say that there is no law now providing a limit to a patent right?

Mr. KERNAN. There is one now since the term has been enlarged to seventeen years. But for all that, as to the old patents issued before that law, of which this is one, men come here under the old law to get an extension. Moreover, Congress is constantly passing special laws authorizing them to go before the Commissioner and on the terms prescribed in the Revised Statutes get an extension. I find no fault with the position that there had better be no extension at all.

Mr. GARLAND. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from New York to the fact that on the 18th of April a bill of this character for the relief of Stephen V. Benét was passed without any opposition or a call of the roll.

Mr. KERNAN. This morning I was instructed to, and did, present a report favoring the allowance of the privilege to a patentee to apply to the Commissioner for an extension. Why? It was an old patent. The patentee made a contract by which a firm that was infringing agreed that they would apply for an extension according to the law, they would bear the expense of the application and attend to all the details ninety days before the expiration of the patent and in consideration of that he agreed to certain things. They took him to their attorney and he signed all the papers. When the time ran out within which the application had to be made, they said the attorney had neglected it, and he lost the chance.

Mr. HARRIS. Is that this case?

Mr. KERNAN. No, but I reported such a one this morning. I am not so familiar with this. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] can explain it. I remember it generally. All I can say is that we are pressed with cases of an exceptional character where there has been apparently great wrong done to the patentee, where the evidence shows he has endeavored to reap the benefits of his invention and he asks that we give him leave by law to go before the Commissioner under the laws on the statute-book and apply to get his patent renewed. It would save great time and great expense if the Senate, not spasmodically by one man on one case calling for the yeas and nays, but by a general act, would declare that there should be no further extensions. By doing that you would say to all these parties: "Do not come here troubling the committee, at great expense to yourselves." I have no feeling. I only want to find out what the sense of the Senate is, and we will conform to it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am very much astonished at the reasoning of the Senator from New York. He calls upon the Senate to pass a statute law to govern a committee and to govern Congress! The Senator knows perfectly well that we have a statute law prescribing the time patents shall run, and he knows that no one Congress can be bound by the acts of a precedent Congress. You have got the law before you, plainly and unmistakably laid down. It is for the committee to say whether that law shall be enforced or not. When that committee report to the Senate that the law is so and so, the Senate will be very apt to sustain them. I say here that I am not making this an exceptional case. I do not know anything about it. I never heard of it until I saw it on the Calendar and read the report, and I say there is no merit in it. It is not an exceptional case. What is it? Mr. Stone, on the 26th of March, 1861, obtained a patent running seventeen years—not an old fourteen-year patent, but the full length of time, seventeen years—

For a new process for making cheese; but, owing to ill health and some infringements made upon said patent by his own agent, the process has never been much used, and he has consequently never received any profit of consequence from his said invention, and therefore asks an extension of seven years.

He has not been able to make money out of it; he has not been able to make the people of the country use it, and thereby render him a profit. That is the excuse for him. Every man, then, to whom a patent has been granted, who has failed to make money out of it, has the same right to come in here that this applicant has. I say the law is explicit now. There are seventeen years allowed; a patent is confined to that length of time. I am not opposing this case specially; I have voted against every solitary one and expect to continue voting against them.

Mr. KERNAN. I knew, of course, what the law was, as my friend states it; but the committee do not mean to report anything except exceptional cases of hardship which are within the line of precedent set by Congress. If Congress agree with my friend from Missouri—I find no fault—and will say "We will not listen to exceptional cases," there will be no further exceptions; the committee can deal with the parties. But now they press upon us. Congress does allow extensions in exceptional cases, and we go on here day after day frequently passing them without the slightest objection, and then there comes an objection, not that the case brought up is not an exceptional one, but the cry is, "I am against them all." If a majority say they agree with my friend from Missouri that there should not be any exception, so be it; we shall act accordingly. If, on the other hand, they think this not an exceptional case, very well. But if they do not mean to have the committee understand that there is no use of bringing any case here at all, then they will have to act on each case to see whether we are right or not in saying it is exceptional.

Mr. DORSEY. This is evidently going to lead to a good deal of debate, and I object to its further consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) Objection being made, the bill goes over.

WILLIAM A. GRAHAM.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 72) for the relief of the heirs of William A. Graham.

Mr. DORSEY. Let that go over.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the report before it goes over. That bill has a remarkable characteristic of keeping us carefully ignorant entirely of what the subject of the patent is. I should think the bill had been specially drawn for not allowing us to know what it is about.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read if there be no objection.

Mr. DORSEY. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next bill will be called.

HERMAN E. AND CHARLES H. DAVIDSON.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 231) for the relief of Herman E. Davidson and the heirs of Charles H. Davidson; which was reported adversely from the Committee on Patents.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the question on the indefinite postponement of the bill.

The bill was postponed indefinitely.

SURETIES OF GEORGE W. CLARKE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 1038) for the relief of Jesse Turner and others, sureties upon the official bond of George W. Clarke, formerly Indian agent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why not apply that relief to all cases?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I want the report read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. HERFORD on the 4th instant:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Jesse Turner and others, asking to be relieved from liability as sureties on bond of George W. Clarke, report as follows:

George W. Clarke was appointed Indian agent and gave bonds as such August 19, 1854, in a penalty of $40,000, with S. M. Hays, Phineas H. White, Charles F. Brown, S. F. Cotterell, Hiram Brodie, James M. Brown, Joseph J. Green, and Jesse Turner as sureties; all of the sureties are dead except James M. Brown, Charles F. Brown, and Jesse Turner.

The agent, Clarke, was found to be in default and relieved from duty on December 31, 1856. The amount of the defalcation is found to be $1,245.77.

No further action was taken in this case until December 15, 1875, when each of the parties living was notified.

Suit was instituted March 6, 1877, in the United States district court for the western district of Arkansas.

The above are the facts as gathered from a letter of Hon. K. Rayner, Solicitor of the Treasury, bearing date February 7, 1878, in response to a letter from a member of this committee, to whom the subject had been referred. The following is an affidavit in the case, which is substantiated by several others:

STATE OF ARKANSAS, Crawford County, ss:

I, Augustus I. Ward, of Crawford County, State of Arkansas, do state upon oath, that I have resided at Van Buren, Crawford County, for the last thirty-four years. That I was well acquainted with George W. Clarke, and Samuel M. Hays, P. H. White, S. F. Cotterell, Hiram Brodie, J. J. Green, Charles F. Brown, James M. Brown, and Jesse Turner, his securities upon his bond as Indian agent, upon which his now reported defalcation occurred in December, 1856. I know that George W. Clarke was the owner of real estate at that time of considerable amount, but do not know what incumbrances, if any, existed against it. His family resided here during most of the time he was in Kansas as Indian agent. Clarke was an energetic man to raise money. All the persons who are named as the securities upon his bond were in solvent circumstances in December, 1856. Since that time, up to the time of the breaking out of the late war, the sum of $1,500 could have been made out of any one of them. Since then, the results of the late war and other causes changed the circumstances of all the persons named as Clarke's securities, and most of them are unable to pay who survived the war.

P. H. White died about 1857; he was a merchant, engaged in business at this place; his estate was closed by administration since the war, and did not pay the creditors in full.

Joseph J. Green died in the spring of 1863; his estate was administered upon; after paying his debts but little was left, which was used or expended for the support of his children; the administration has been closed long since.

Samuel M. Hays, one of the securities upon Clarke's bond, died in 1871. His estate has been administered upon; not yet closed. He left some property, both real and personal, but after the payment of the debts probated against the estate I think there will be but little left.

Hiram Brodie, one of the securities on Clarke's bond, died in February, 1875. The estate is being administered upon, and I am informed and believe that after the payment of the debts probated against said estate there will be but little left. The property of the estate was small in amount.

Sutton F. Cotterell, another of the reported securities, died about November, 1875, at Little Rock, Arkansas. His estate was insolvent. Had no property, as I am informed.

Charles F. Brown, another of the named securities upon Clarke's bond, is insolvent; has no property; took the benefit of the bankrupt law since the war and has been discharged; paid his debts in that way.

James M. Brown left this county in 1862; had property in negroes and mules at the time he left here and some real estate, long since sold. His present circumstances I have no means of knowing, as he resides in the State of Texas.

Jesse Turner I have known intimately for thirty-four years. He is a practicing attorney at this place, advanced in life, has some real estate, and should he have this debt to pay it will greatly embarrass him and he can only pay it at a great sacrifice of his small amount of property.

I have been engaged in the business of a merchant, most of the time at my residence, at Van Buren, Crawford County, for the past thirty-four years, and have, as I believe, the means of knowledge of the matters hereinbefore stated by me.

AUGUSTUS J. WARD.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 15th day of February, A. D. 1878.

JOHN B. OGDEN,

Notary Public.

From the letter of the Solicitor of the Treasury and this affidavit we obtain the following facts:

George W. Clarke, the Indian agent, became defaulter, and his default was known to the Government December 31, 1856. No further action was taken in the matter until December 15, 1875, a space of nineteen years lacking fifteen days, the sureties being uninformed of the default for that space of time. Suit was brought March 6, 1877, which is more than twenty years after the right of action had accrued. If the Government had used proper diligence it is quite probable all or a good portion of the amount could have been made out of the principal; certainly the other securities could have all been compelled to pay their pro rata of the amount and these securities relieved to that extent. The Government, by its own laches, has lost a part of its security, and to that extent has damaged the other remaining securities.

In a case in England it was declared by one of the judges "that long dormant claims have more of cruelty than justice in them, and that Christianity forbids an attempt at enforcing the payment of a debt which time and misfortune have rendered the debtor unable to discharge." (See A. Lout v. Cross, 3 Bing. 11, 329.)

Of the original eight sureties, five are dead and three living, and possessed of very limited means, perhaps none worth anything, unless it be Jesse Turner, who is a practicing attorney, advanced in years, and owning a small amount of real estate.

Under the circumstances the committee believe that great injustice has been done to the sureties by the delay on the part of the Government, and think that the remaining sureties should be relieved from liability on said bond, and therefore report the accompanying bill and recommend its passage.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That involves the whole question of the propriety of not having a statute of limitations against the United States. That is all there is to it. These sureties of course knew that they had signed this bond. They had the means of knowing whether the bond had been forfeited or not. They did not choose to inquire; and the agents of the Government were negligent in not prosecuting when they ought to have done so. According to the principle of law which has always held in the United States, that the United States is not within the statutes of limitations, then there has been no default on the part of the United States. If that is an unsound principle of law, we ought to change the law in general; and as that involves this general principle, I think this case ought to go over, because it goes to the bottom of the whole thing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The consideration of the bill is objected to, and it goes over.

Mr. GARLAND. Before the case goes over, with the permission of the Senator from Vermont and as part of the history to go with it, I wish to have a letter from the Secretary of the Navy on this subject read, to show that the principal, George W. Clarke, after this immense default, was appointed by the Government a purser of the Navy in 1858.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter will be read, if there be no objection. The Chair hears no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 10, 1878.

Sir: I have the honor to inform you, in reply to your letter of the 9th instant, that George W. Clarke, of Arkansas, was appointed a paymaster in the United States Navy June 2, 1858; August 20, 1858, he was ordered to the Supply; May 16, 1859, detached and settle accounts; January 9, 1860, to the Pawnee; February 10, August 21, 1860, detached and to the Powhatan; March 28, 1861, detached and settle accounts; April 3, 1861, ordered to Washington to settle accounts; June 1, 1861, dismissed from the naval service, from April 2, 1861.

Very respectfully, &c.,

R. W. THOMPSON,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. A. H. GARLAND,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. Buchanan made a great mistake in appointing him; that was all.

Mr. GARLAND. The only point about that is to show that the United States Government at the time thought the man was good enough to be made a purser in the Navy.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Navy Department did not know of the default, probably.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator from Vermont has correctly stated the principle involved in this bill; and believing that the statute of limitations does not run against the Government, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] and myself were unable to vote for the allowance of this claim in the committee, and therefore dissented.

Mr. HEREFORD. I desire to say a word, inasmuch as—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The debate goes on by general consent, objection having been made to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am called out for a moment; I do not object to the Senator going on, and if he will give me leave to say a word I shall be obliged to him.

Mr. HEREFORD. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely wish to add, without going into the debate now, that this kind of relief is rather novel here. I remember that three or four or five years ago a case from Indiana very much like this one was presented to the Senate, and after great consideration, I think the Senate declined to give the relief asked for, and upon the principle I have stated. Of course that does not prove that we were not wrong then. I thank my friend from West Virginia for giving me leave to say this much.

Mr. HEREFORD. Inasmuch as it devolved on me as a member of the committee to examine this case and make the report, I will state very succinctly the facts.

Mr. Clarke was appointed Indian agent, and being a defaulter his default was known to the Government in 1856. The Government took no action at all to notify the securities in any way of the default until 1875, nearly nineteen years, and no suit was brought upon the bond until 1877, more than twenty years after the right of action accrued. During that time, as is shown by the report, five of the securities died being insolvent, and their estates were wound up. The other three securities are worth nothing except perhaps it be one, Mr. Jesse Turner, who is a man of very small means. The committee thought that, inasmuch as the Government had lain upon its oars this length of time, keeping the securities ignorant of this default, it was a great hardship to the securities, and that if there was any loss it ought to fall on the Government, which was more able to bear it than the securities. It is shown by the report that the money could have been made out of the principal himself if the Government officers had been diligent in the prosecution of their duties.

The Senator from Vermont says that these securities could have ascertained the default soon after the default occurred. But they were led astray even as to the investigation of that matter, for from the document that was sent to the desk a moment ago by the Senator from Arkansas, (and the same facts appear in that document as do in the papers in this case,) it seems that about a year after this default the Government appointed this same man to another office, and one of the same securities that was on the original bond went upon his new bond. That was very good evidence to the securities that this man's bond was not in default upon his first appointment, for no security would suppose that the Government would appoint this man Clarke to another important office if he was still in default. Perhaps the Department itself did not know it; I do not know; but his having been appointed a second time to an important office after his default was very well calculated to mislead the securities and lead them to believe that his accounts as Indian agent prior to the second appointment were all square and settled in the Department.

It seemed to me, and it seemed to the majority of the committee, that under these circumstances the Government, after laying upon its oars twenty years, should not make this money now off one of the securities, he being the only one out of the eight that is now living and worth anything, and he very little.

It is true, as the Senator from Vermont has said, that this brings up indirectly the question as to the policy of there being a statute of repose as against the Government to do away with the old common-law doctrine that no time runs against the king. I think we should have just such a law. I think there should be a statute of limitation against the General Government as well as against the private citizens thereof, and this is only carrying out that principle. I think the Government should not lay on its oars for twenty years and allow the principal and the other securities to dispose of their property and thereby throw greater burdens upon the remaining surety.

If a creditor holds several securities in his hands and he relinquishes any one of those securities, he relinquishes his right against all of the securities; some of the authorities say even to the extent of the whole debt. All the decisions do not go so far, but the current of the decisions is that he loses his right, not merely to the extent of the security thus received, but even to the whole debt. That is just this case. By the delay on the part of the Government, the Government has lost a part of its security. Only three out of the eight sureties are alive, and only one out of the three is worth anything. The Government could have made the debt, as I said before, if it had proceeded within a reasonable time after the default. It then could have made the whole debt out of the principal. Now they seek to make it out of one of the securities after all but one are insolvent and five out of the eight are dead. I think it presents a case of very great hardship, and it presents a case where the Government should interfere, and say that we will not make this debt off this one security.

Mr. EDMUNDS. With general consent I should like to say a word in reply to my honorable friend from West Virginia. What he said about the law between private persons where a creditor gives up a part of his security is undoubtedly true to a certain extent. If I have got a security from a debtor where there is a surety, that security of course is also for the benefit of the surety, and if I voluntarily give up that I have done a wrong to the surety, a legal wrong; but if I have a debt against a man with eight sureties, and merely sit still within the statute of limitations and do not sue, because one of the sureties becomes bankrupt and another runs away that does not excuse the other sureties either in law or morals. They have a right to pay the debt any time they please; they can come and pay me the moment it is due, and then they can turn around against the other sureties and say, "contribute."

My honorable friend proceeds on the principle that a man who signs a bond to the United States as a surety is under no sort of obligation to pay it until he is squeezed into doing so. I deny the proposition. It is a business transaction. He engages that his principal shall pay over and respond for the public money that is intrusted to him, and it is his business to see in the time of it, knowing as he does that he is responsible for that money, to see to it that his principal keeps his engagement and does pay it. The moment he finds that he has not done so, as he can at any moment by inquiry at the proper office, then it is his moral as well as legal duty to make up the money himself. He does not choose to do it; he waits; the Government waits as it ought not to do for the protection of other people I agree, but the Government has to deal through agents, a great many agents, and the people employing these agents employ them with the statement to the persons who have signed as sureties, "You are bound all the time; six years do not let you off; ten years do not let you off; twenty years do not; you are bound to take some interest in this thing yourself, and to see to it that your principal does respond to his obligations." The Government has not acted. It was a part of the contract that it need not act. The sureties assumed the duty of seeing to it that the principal did pay over the money. They did not choose to take any interest in the matter, and it ran along; some of the sureties have died. That is no ground.

Now, then, on the general principle, Mr. President—because I do not want to delay the other cases that are not disputable by talking about this—the principle upon which the statute of limitations does not apply to the Government is this, as distinguished from individuals: as I understand, between private individuals evidence is lost; the means of defense go away; the evidence of liability is lost; and therefore the law says, where everybody is looking out for his own interest, there shall be a limit to disputes about dealings between man and man. With the Government the case stands differently. The liability of an officer of the Government is always found in the public records made at the time. The amount of money that is intrusted to him appears in the public records of the Treasury evidenced by his vouchers. The amount of his expenditures, if he does his duty, is evidenced by public vouchers which have to be filed by law, within very short spaces of time, from time to time with his accounts. So the record evidenced all the time shows in general—there may be a possible exception here and there—exactly what the liability of the man is. In such a case the policy of the law is, and I think it a right policy, that this man and the men who engaged with him shall see to it that some particular clerk in some Auditor's office in the Treasury shall not let the thing be obscured by omitting his duty and thus let the sureties escape. That is the principle on which it stands. It is entirely different from a statute of limitations in respect to private persons.

Mr. HEREFORD. Will the Senator from Vermont allow me to ask him a question? Does he not think the Government, when they ascertained this defalcation in 1856, should have notified the sureties of that fact?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No sir, the law imposed no such obligation.

Mr. HEREFORD. The law does not, it is true.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It was the affirmative duty of the sureties, and they were bound to know, just as much as the clerk was who settled the account, how the account stood. Now, the question is whether you are to visit the tax-payer with the default of the clerk, if you say it is a default; whether when two persons are in fault, the surety for not paying the money as he ought, and the clerk for not telling his principal, as he ought, which is to suffer?

Mr. HEREFORD. I should like to call the Senator's attention to another fact in this case, which perhaps he did not know before; and that is that after the defalcation on the first bond, the Government appointed Clarke again to another important office. Was not that likely to mislead the securities on the first bond?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not in the least degree if the sureties did their duty.

Mr. HEREFORD. It so much misled them that one of the same men went on the second bond.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Probably he went on the second bond, if he understood his rights and wanted to protect them, on the principle that his principal was perfectly capable of paying up the whole debt. I do not agree that Mr. Buchanan did right in appointing this man over again, but probably Mr. Buchanan did not know anything about the default for the very reason that I have stated, that the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury cannot know every man's transactions with the Government. The duty was on the surety just as much as it was on the officers of the Government, and the surety, supposing he knew as he was bound to know and could have known at any moment how the account stood, might very well have said, "This man owes the Government a thousand dollars; now he is perfectly responsible; out of the salary that he is going to get from this new office he will pay it up in three months," and signed the new bond. Certainly when he was called upon or asked by his friend to sign the new bond, he could very well have said, "Mr. Paymaster—if that was the man—" how is it about that transaction that I signed your bond for before? I think I will ask the accounting officer of the Treasury how your account stands." He does ask and finds how it stands, and has the choice to sign or not as he likes.

The difficulty with the proposition is, you are to say all the time that we are responsible for the neglect of some of the minor officers of the Government to push these claims, and are entirely estopped by the fact that by reason of their not being pushed the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Navy, who knew nothing about the former transaction, have been cheated into appointing this man again with the same sureties. Mr. President, in the language of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] "that won't do." I am sorry for this particular gentleman. He ought to have attended to his interest when he could protect himself; but he did not choose to do it. It is his misfortune, but I am opposed to taxing the people to make good that misfortune. However, the thing is to go over and I will not go into it further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next bill will be stated.

J. W. RICHARD AND J. S. BROWN & BROTHER.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 88) for the relief of James W. Richard and J. S. Brown & Brother, Denver, Colorado; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate $5,004 to pay James W. Richard and J. S. Brown & Brother, of the city of Denver, Colorado, for flour delivered to the Los Pinos Indian agency in Colorado during the year 1875.

The Committee on Indian Affairs reported the bill with an amendment, to insert before the words "four dollars" the word "twenty;" so as to make the amount $5,024.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HOAR. Is there any report accompanying that bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is; the report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. OGLESBY on the 5th instant:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 88) for the relief of James W. Richard and J. S. Brown & Brother, of Denver, Colorado, report:

That the testimony in the case shows that H. F. Bond, United States Indian agent for the Los Pinos agency in Colorado, entered into a contract with the firm of J. W. Richard & Co., of Denver, Colorado, for the purchase from said Richard & Co. of one hundred thousand pounds of flour, to be delivered by said firm to the new agency located in the Uncompahgre Valley, on or before 25th December, 1875, at the price of $11.95 per one hundred pounds; that prior to said agreement with said firm the said Indian agent had advertised for bids for furnishing said flour, according to the regulations of the Indian Bureau, and received, under such notice, two bids, one to furnish said quantity of flour at $9.50 per hundred pounds and the other to furnish it at $8.50 per hundred pounds, but that subsequently both of said offers of contract were forfeited by the parties making the same. Thereupon said agent claims that he was forced to go into the market at Denver and offer to purchase the flour, and that said Richard & Co. made the lowest bid to furnish the same at the point first stated in this report. The evidence further shows that Richard & Co. delivered all of said flour at what is known as the "old agency," about ninety miles nearer the city of Denver than the Los Pinos agency, the point at which the flour was to have been delivered under the contract. Notice of this contract with Richard & Co. having been furnished to the Indian Department, the Commissioner refused to confirm the same, and notified the Indian agent and Richard & Co. of the fact.

In the mean time, however, the agent had issued to the Indians of the Los Pinos agency sixty-two thousand eight hundred pounds of said flour. The remaining thirty-seven thousand two hundred or three hundred and seventy-two sacks were by the agent returned to and accepted by the said J. W. Richard & Co. Afterward said firm of Richard & Co. agreed to accept from the Indian Department in payment in discharge of said sixty-two thousand eight hundred pounds, distributed to the Indians as aforesaid, eight cents per pound. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs accepted these terms and agreed that the amount should be recognized by the Department as a just claim for the amount of flour furnished in quantity and quality as set out in the contract.

The committee herewith inclose communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs upon this subject, dated February 15, 1877, addressed to Hon. WILLIAM R. ALLISON, United States Senate; and a further communication, dated February 22, 1878, from B. A. Hayt, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, addressed to Hon. H. M. TELLER, of the Senate, upon this subject, in which communication the Indian Bureau recognizes the justice of the claim, and recommends its payment.

But as said contract was not made in accordance with the regulations of the Indian Bureau the amount cannot be paid out of the regular appropriation for such purpose; a special act of Congress is deemed necessary in order to furnish the same.

The bill provides for an appropriation of $5,004; the sum admitted to be due by the Indian Bureau is $5,024.

The Committee on Indian Affairs have amended the bill accordingly, and, as amended, recommend its passage.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ROBERT PLATT.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 797) for the relief of Acting Master Robert Platt, United States Navy; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. By its terms the President of the United States is authorized to appoint Acting Master Robert Platt, United States Navy, for long and meritorious services, a master in the regular Navy of the United States, not in the line of promotion.

Mr. SARGENT. I think there will be no objection to this bill. This man rendered long and faithful service as an acting officer of the Navy. We propose that he shall retain the rank he now has without opportunity of promotion. He has rendered very great service in the Coast Survey, been engaged in the survey of nearly all of the Atlantic coast the last fifteen or twenty years. We thought it was an exceptional case, that he ought to have this recognition.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUBURBAN RAILWAY COMPANY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 532) to incorporate the Suburban Railway Company of Washington, in the District of Columbia.

Mr. ALLISON. I think that bill had better go over.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope my friend from Iowa will not object to the consideration of this bill. I do not think there can be any objection to it, and it is important to the parties interested in it that it be disposed of one way or the other. If this charter is to be granted it is very important that it should be at once, so that they may have the good weather of summer for the purpose of proceeding with the improvement.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Tennessee if there were modifications made in the bill?

Mr. HARRIS. Exactly according to the suggestions made by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. I withdraw my objection.

The amendment reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia was read, being to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That Joseph B. Bryan, Robert K. Elliott, J. Sayles Brown, B. F. Guy, George W. Linville, John J. Johnson, W. G. Palmer, Octavius Knight, Amos Hunt, Andrew Kremer, William H. Claggett, John C. McKelden, Walter R. Irwin, Leopold Luchs, John W. Boteler, Franklin Rives, Lewis Clephane, Clark Mills, and H. Nelson Chapman, their associates and successors, are hereby constituted a body-corporate by the name, style, and title of the Suburban Railway Company of Washington, in the District of Columbia, with power to sue and subject of being sued, plead and being impleaded; and cause to be made for the use of said company a seal, and the same to change at pleasure; with authority to construct a single or double track railway, with the appurtenances thereto belonging, within the city of Washington, and extending the same beyond the boundary of said city, as hereinafter described, within said District.

SEC. 2. Irwin and lands belonging to the estate of the late William Hickey; and thence crossing the old turnpike at a point near the northwest corner of the farm upon which is located the Boys' Reform School, and continuing in a northerly direction to the most feasible point of crossing the tracks of the Baltimore and Ohio Railway Company, and through the lands of J. Sayles Brown to the State line of Maryland.

SEC. 3. There shall be two branches of said railway, namely: The first commencing at the western terminus of said railway, and running in a westerly direction, parallel with lands of William H. Claggett, described on the plat of Rosedale and Isherwood as No. 25, and lands of Andrew Kremer, to junction with F street and Fifteenth street, northeast; thence through said F street to its junction with New Jersey avenue; thence southward through said avenue to C street, northwest; thence through C street to First street, northwest; thence through Indiana avenue to a point at or near the front entrance of the east wing of the City Hall: Provided, That if, on an examination by a competent engineer, it shall appear that the public interests and convenience shall be subserved thereby, the said company are hereby authorized to lay a single track only from New Jersey avenue at its intersection with D street, and through said street northward to the intersection of the same with Indiana avenue to the point of terminus, as hereinbefore mentioned. The second branch of said railway shall commence from the aforesaid western terminus, and be located on Nineteenth street, east, passing in front of the jail of said District, to Georgia avenue; thence through said avenue to point near the northern entrance of the navy-yard, and no further.

SEC. 4. The said railway and its branches shall be deemed real estate, and, together with other real and personal property, shall be liable to taxation as other real and personal property, and to none other.

SEC. 5. That the capital of said company shall not exceed $250,000, to be divided into shares of $50 each, and shall be deemed personal property, and transferable in such manner as the by-laws of said company shall direct.

SEC. 7. That nothing herein contained shall prevent the Government of the United States from altering the grade or otherwise improving the streets and avenues through which said railway track or tracks shall be laid, and in such event it shall be the duty of the said railway company to conform to such alterations and improvements. And it shall be the duty of said railway company to keep said tracks, and for the space of two feet beyond the outer rail thereof, and also the space between the tracks, at all times as well paved as other portions of said streets are paved, and in good order, without expense to the United States, the city of Washington, or the District of Columbia; and that said railway tracks shall be laid in the center of the streets, as near as may be, in the most approved manner adapted to street railways, with rails of the most approved pattern, to be determined by the chief executive authority of the District of Columbia; the rails to be laid upon an even surface with the pavement where the streets are paved, and where the streets are not paved, upon an even surface with the grade of the street; and the space between the tracks shall not be more than six feet within the city limits.

SEC. 8. In consideration of the concessions of the right of way through the streets and avenues of the city of Washington, as heretofore mentioned, by the Government of the United States, it shall be obligatory upon the said railroad company, upon the completion of the F street branch aforesaid, to place upon said track such prison van or vans as the Government shall provide, for the purpose of transmitting, from time to time, as the supreme court of the District of Columbia shall order and direct, all prisoners held in custody in the jail of the District of Columbia to the City Hall, and returning the same to said jail, for which service the said railway company shall be entitled to such compensation annually as shall be reasonable and just, to be paid as other expenses of the supreme court of the District of Columbia are paid.

SEC. 9. That whenever the owners of land through which it is proposed to build said railway shall refuse to agree with the said company as to the price to be paid for the right of way contemplated in section 2 of this act, it shall be lawful for the said railway company to apply to the proper authority of said District for such relief as may be required, and in the manner provided in chapter 18, class 7, of the Revised Statutes of the United States for the District of Columbia, approved June 30, 1874, in relation to the condemnation of lands for railway purposes.

SEC. 10. That within thirty days after the passage and approval of this act the corporators herein named, or a majority of them, or if any refuse to act, then a majority of the remainder, shall cause books of subscription to so much of the capital stock of said company as shall be necessary to build and equip said railway, the amount to be determined by said corporators, to be opened and kept open in some convenient place or places in the city of Washington for a period to be fixed by said corporators, not less than two days; and said corporators shall give notice by advertisement in some daily paper published in said city, of the time and place where said books shall be opened; and subscribers to said stock on said books shall be held to be stockholders: Provided, That no person shall be permitted to subscribe for more than two hundred shares: Provided further, That each subscriber shall pay, at the time of subscribing, 15 per cent. of the amount subscribed to the treasurer appointed by said corporators, or said subscription shall be null and void. If at the end of twenty days a larger amount than is estimated to be sufficient to construct and equip the railway as aforesaid shall have been subscribed, the books shall be closed and the corporators herein named shall proceed to apportion the stock so taken among the subscribers pro rata, and make public proclamation of the number of shares allotted to each, which shall be completed on the day the books are closed: Provided, That nothing shall be received in payment of the percentage as aforesaid but money. When the books of subscription of stock shall be closed as aforesaid, the corporators, or a majority of them, and in case any of them refuse or neglect to act, then a majority of the remainder shall, within ten days thereafter, call the first meeting of the stockholders of said company to meet within ten days thereafter for the choice of seven directors, of which public notice shall be given for five days in some daily paper published in the city of Washington or by written or printed personal notices to each stockholder by the secretary of said company. And in all meetings of stockholders each share shall entitle the holder to one vote, which may be given in person or by proxy.

SEC. 11. That the government of the affairs of the said company shall be vested in a board of directors, who shall be stockholders, and who shall hold office for one year, and until others are duly elected and inducted to take their places. SEC. 21. That this act may at any time be altered, amended, or repealed by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire of the Senator who reports this new draft of this bill whether this railroad track crosses any public property of the United States.

Mr. HARRIS. No, sir. The fact is that the route provided for by the bill does not touch, except the streets of the city so far as it passes over those, any public property.

Mr. HOAR. What is the length of the railroad and branches?

Mr. HARRIS. The northern branch I suppose is six or seven miles long; running through the country.

Mr. HOAR. Is it intended to be a horse railway or a steam-railway?

Mr. HARRIS. It is intended to be propelled by a dummy engine, by steam.

Mr. HOAR. The bill seems to provide for the construction of this railroad track through the streets of the city of Washington and the District of Columbia, and provides for one of the branches extending to a point out near the present depot of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and the main line extending to a point where it crosses that road at the line of the State of Maryland, and it contains an authority to consolidate with any steam-railroad in the State of Maryland. It seems to me that this bill, in substance, might authorize the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad to extend its road along this track to any extent, and to use it as an ordinary steam-railroad, with the sole limitation that cars shall not go more than six miles an hour where they cross streets.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Massachusetts will carefully examine the section to which he refers I think he will see that such construction would be impossible; and, if possible, I should be glad if the Senator from Massachusetts would prepare such amendment as will effectually exclude the idea that he expresses, and I shall most cheerfully accept it.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator point out the clause in the bill which prevents that construction?

Mr. HARRIS. The section that authorizes consolidation confines the consolidation to a road of a similar character to the one that is here incorporated.

Mr. HOAR. That is a railroad constructed in the ordinary way, to be propelled by steam, and without any accountability to any public authority, the authorities of the District or any other. I think the bill had better go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair.) Objection being made, the bill will be passed over.

Mr. HARRIS. I should be glad if the Senator would prepare an amendment excluding the possibility of that construction, and let the bill be acted on to-day. It is one in which I have no earthly interest, of course; but to the parties who are interested it is important, if they are to have this charter at all, that it be granted at the earliest day possible.

Mr. BLAINE. While the two Senators may agree on an amendment, I will call up a conference report.

Mr. HOAR. I think the bill had better go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill will go over.

IMPROVEMENTS OF FOX AND WISCONSIN RIVERS.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I should like to interrupt the call of the Calendar for a moment in order to have a resolution passed requesting information from the Secretary of War. I offer the resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to report to the Senate what amounts of money have been expended for improvements of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers and intersecting canal or canals in the State of Wisconsin; also how much it will cost to complete the said improvements so as to make the same navigable and useful, and what public benefit has been or is likely to be derived from such improvements and expenditure; also how much money has been expended for procuring the right of way, flowage or damage to private property, and how much money has been expended for attorneys' fees in settling rights of way; the names of the attorneys and the names and salaries of all men employed as superintendents upon the said improvements.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I object to the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. HOAR in the chair.) The resolution lies over under the rule until to-morrow.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BLAINE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3740) to provide for deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for prior years, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 15, 16, 18, 19, 25, 28, 30, 31, and 37.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 13, 14, 17, 20, 24, 26, 27, 32, 33, 34, 35, and 36, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 12, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out of said amendment the words "and binding," and strike out "forty" and insert in lieu thereof "thirty," and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 21, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "fifteen" and substitute therefor the word "twelve," and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 22, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out the words "two thousand" and insert in lieu thereof "fifteen hundred;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 23, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Amend the title of the bill by inserting after the word "years" in said title the words "for subsistence of the Army;" and the Senate agree to the same.

J. G. BLAINE,

JAS. B. BECK,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

EUGENE HALE,

JAMES H. BLOUNT,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BLAINE. I will explain the report briefly. The conference report is signed by two members of the House and two of the Senate. The bill as it came from the House had thirty-seven amendments put upon it by the Senate. Those that the House refused to agree to and that the Senate conferees have receded from I will explain, which will be all that will be necessary.

In the case of the printing and binding for the Interior Department we agreed to strike out the words "and binding," so as to confine the appropriation to printing, and we agreed to reduce it from $40,000 to $30,000.

"For general repairs and improvements" for the Government Hospital for the Insane an appropriation of $5,000 was added by the Senate which our conferees recede from. We have agreed that it may go over to be taken up in the general deficiency bill. These are only partial deficiency bills that we are now considering.

The appropriation for $75,000 for the schools of the District of Columbia the Senate conferees recede from. I will explain this more at length in a moment.

From the appropriations for the Rocky Mountain surveys and for the geological and geographical surveys of the Territories, a deficiency of $25,000, the Senate recede.

The Senate conferees agreed to change the amount in the amendment for the mint at San Francisco from $15,000 to $12,000, on the recommendation of Dr. Linderman. A similar change was made for the mint at Denver by reducing it from $2,000 to $1,500.

I will not speak of the numerous amendments which the House has receded from their disagreement to.

"For fertilizers, material, and labor on the Capitol grounds during the present fiscal year," the Senate amended the House bill by inserting $20,000 instead of $9,000. The Senate conferees were compelled to recede on that point.

"To ascertain the depth of water and width of channel secured and maintained from time to time by James B. Eads at the South Pass of the Mississippi River, and to enable the Secretary of War to report, during the construction of the work, the payments made from time to time, and the probable times of other payments, and to report," &c., the Senate put in an appropriation of $7,500, which the Senate conferees have agreed to recede from, on the ground that they thought it required a little further investigation and it would be readily taken up and would be quite as available in the next bill.

"For printing and binding for the War Department, to be done at the Government Printing Office, a deficiency for the fiscal year 1878, $18,000," is an amendment that the Senate recede from.

"To repay to the Smithsonian Institution expenses incurred in the transportation of public documents under the joint resolution approved July 25, 1868, $1,781," is an amendment that the Senate recede from.

The only point upon which there was a very considerable reluctance on the part of the Senate conferees to recede was on the $75,000 appropriated for the schools of the District of Columbia, and the $25,000 for the Hayden survey. There was a little more disposition to recede because of the absolute impossibility, as it appeared, of securing an agreement with the House on the appropriation for the District schools, and a little more disposition also because of the fact that there was some misapprehension in the Senate when the provision was agreed to, owing to a statement made by the Senator who is chairman of the District Committee, also under a misapprehension, that the $75,000 of last year had been repaid. The commissioners of the District frankly appeared before the Committee on Appropriations of the House and said that had not been done and that there was no expectation of it ever being done, and a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury stated the same thing. So this was regarded in the nature of a gratuity or an advance direct from the Treasury to the District. I should myself be entirely willing to vote for it on that ground; but it appeared to me that that was not the ground upon which the Senate voted for it, and my own views of propriety induced me to recede on that account, leaving it for the Senate to deal with it on this bill or hereafter as it may see fit. I certainly feel authorized to say that an agreement with the House upon it in the present attitude of the case is simply an impossibility, and therefore we had to take Hobson's choice.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the consequence? Will the schools stop?

Mr. BLAINE. I know nothing more than that the consequences, it seems to me, will be serious. There is a deficiency in the funds of the District, not a deficiency technically, as we had that question up when the appropriation was here before, not a deficiency which we are bound under the law to provide for, but there is a deficiency of resources to maintain the schools.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does not the present law require the schools to be maintained?

Mr. BLAINE. There is no obligation whatever on the part of the Treasury of the United States, there is no obligation under which the United States have obliged themselves by law. I think probably that the Senator from Vermont will agree with me that there is a very strong moral obligation to do it which I am ready to vote to fulfill at any time, but that there is a statute obligation to do it I never contended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think my honorable friend misapprehended the question which I put in my seat. I do not maintain at all that the United States is under any legal obligation to appropriate this money; but my inquiry was whether under the state of the existing law applicable to the District it is not the duty of the District authorities out of the District funds to provide for these schools?

Mr. BLAINE. Yes; but they have not got the money.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But there is a general fund of taxation that brings in money every year.

Mr. BLAINE. There is undoubtedly, and we might just as well look the thing in the face, although probably this deficiency bill is not the precise place to discuss it. There is a chronic deficiency in the finances of this District. They are not able to maintain themselves and to fulfill the obligations which in the law they are expected to perform by the present available resources coming from taxation. The debt is so large, the times have been so hard, the shrinkage has been so great, that considering the amount of property available for taxation, notwithstanding municipal debt is the scourge of this country, Washington City has the largest debt in proportion to wealth of any city in the Union. I may be wrong, but I think it is so.

Mr. MERRIMON. Did I understand the Senator to say a moment ago that the advance made by the Treasury to the commissioners last year for the purposes of public schools has not been refunded?

Mr. BLAINE. It has not been, and the Senator will remember that a statement, which must have been made inadvertently, was made by the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and he made it in accordance with what I thought was the fact also, that it had been refunded. It was so stated here.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am very much astonished at that, because my information was that it had been refunded.

Mr. BLAINE. So I thought; and it was the influence of the Senator from North Carolina, I may say, that carried the amendment. It was somewhat debated, and the way it was reported was in the form in which the previous appropriation of $75,000 had been made, to be paid out of the proceeds derived from taxation not needed for other purposes. That on its face was almost a giving away.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That put the schools at the foot of the list.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, no; we advanced them $75,000 to be repaid out of moneys raised by taxation in the District which were not needed for other purposes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But all the money was needed for something else.

Mr. BLAINE. It would be very likely to be. It would be very much like an individual agreeing to pay $10,000 when he found it convenient and had that amount on hand for which he had no other possible use.

Mr. DORSEY. I hope the Senator from Maine will allow me a word. The other day when this matter was up I stated that the $75,000 which the United States advanced last year for the support of these schools had been repaid. I made that statement upon the authority of the school board, just as I recollected. At all events if they did not make the statement in so many words, they left the impression on my mind, and I think on the mind of all the members of the committee, that the money had been refunded that was advanced last year, and that this $75,000 was to be refunded in the same way.

Mr. BLAINE. I shared in the mistake of the Senator and by silence I was just as much in a certain sense accountable for the error as he by speech. But as a matter of fact, it was not repaid, and the commissioners, Governor Dennison and Mr. Bryan (so the House conferees inform us) have appeared before their committee, honestly desiring to inform them that if there was any expectation of this money being repaid the foundation for such a hope was very fragile, and that there had never been an expectation that it would be repaid, and that is what induced me as one conferee on the part of the Senate to recede, because it seemed to me then that the appropriation had been made upon a misapprehension of facts, for a part of which misapprehension I had to charge myself. The Senator from North Carolina follows me, I am sure, in all this statement.

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes, sir; I am utterly amazed at what the Senator tells the Senate. I learned in committee—exactly how I do not now remember—that the money advanced last year had been refunded, and I had the impression that the law was peremptory requiring it to be refunded; and when I saw that there might be a loop-hole in the measure before the Senate by which persons desiring to do so might escape refunding the money, I made the motion I did the other day so as to make the law, if the bill should become a law, peremptory. I thought the law of last year was peremptory. I am astonished at this information.

Mr. BLAINE. I remember very well the Senator's statement, and it carried the appropriation beyond a doubt. I have said all that I feel called upon to say in regard to it.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine if the $2,000 payable to the Howard University for rent of the Freedmen's Hospital is retained?

Mr. BLAINE. Yes, sir; and I can in a moment tell what was put in. All the amendments, nine in number, relating to expenditures for the Senate were agreed to without dispute. The items for the Government Hospital for the Insane, of $9,583 for deficiency, are agreed to. The rent for the Freedmen's Hospital is agreed to. All the appropriations for the mints, with the few changes I have alluded to, are agreed to. The appropriation for expenses incurred in obtaining abstracts and information of real estate acquired under the internal-revenue laws of $600 is agreed to.

One item I have omitted. We amended the forty-thousand-dollar appropriation for surveyors and gaugers by making it $100,000. That amendment is now receded from.

The appropriation "to complete the work of adapting the ponds in the Monument lot in the city of Washington to the culture of carp for distribution throughout the United States," the House agrees to.

The House agrees to the three-hundred-thousand-dollar advance for the subsistence of the Army, in order that there may be some advantage taken of the current of the Missouri, insisting, however, as the House did that the title of the bill should be changed, as that was not in any sense a proper deficiency; so that the title is changed so as to embrace that object.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Did we disagree to the title before?

Mr. BLAINE. No; but this changed the object of the bill so much that the House conferees in agreeing to it said that the title ought to be changed because it was not properly a deficiency.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The title was outside your authority.

Mr. BLAINE. Most decidedly not outside of our authority. The House agree to the expenses for the Des Moines Rapids; the House agree to the deficiency for the Marine Corps; the House agree to the appropriation for the observation of the solar eclipse in July, 1878; the House agree to the amendment to print a set of watch and station bills at the Government Printing Office, for the Navy; they agree to the deficiency appropriation for the New Brunswick and Canada Railway; and in fact the House conferees were very liberally and kindly disposed.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, I had the honor to be a member of the conference committee whose report has just been submitted, and regret that I was unable to concur in the report. I will very briefly state some of the reasons.

There are several of the Senate amendments from which the conferees on the part of the Senate have receded which I think ought to have been insisted upon. In the first place, on page 9 of the bill the Senate inserted an amendment striking out $10,000 and inserting $100,000 "for salaries, expenses, and fees of store-keepers, agents, surveyors, gaugers, and miscellaneous expenses." Possibly I would have consented to recede from this amendment if it had been the only one about which there was difficulty. The action of the conference committee on this proposition amounts to simply this, that we shall have to appropriate another deficiency hereafter, it will probably make necessary the addition of another deficiency bill to the long list of that kind of bills which have come before the Senate this Congress. I think we have already had seven from the House of Representatives. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue tells us most distinctly and positively that unless he has from $100,000 to $150,000 more for this branch of the service the Treasury will suffer severe losses from his inability to properly guard the revenues, that this appropriation is necessary to enable him to collect the taxation imposed by the law upon the distillation of whisky, &c. Forty thousand dollars was appropriated for this by the House of Representatives; $150,000 the officer in charge says is absolutely necessary. The Senate, in the exercise of its discretion, and of sound judgment in my humble opinion, increased it $100,000. It ought to have been more, but even we temporized a little on that subject preferring to divide the sum into two or three rather than face the question squarely and appropriate what is absolutely necessary for the service. The conference committee yielded the $100,000, making it $40,000, thus providing for deficiency bill No. 8, or for a loss to the revenue several times greater than the sum asked for.

Now I enter this prophecy, Mr. President, and I ask the Senate to note it, that if we agree to this conference report, just so certainly as we remain here until the 30th of June we shall be informed of a loss of revenue or be compelled to appropriate another deficiency for this purpose. I am thoroughly weary of dividing these deficiency bills and subdividing them into eight, ten, fifteen, or twenty—nobody knows how many—when a single deficiency bill, or at most two, should cover the whole ground. When we know that a certain amount of money is necessary to carry on the Government, why not appropriate it at once instead of dividing it into half a dozen sums. That sort of division is not economy.

I made the suggestion some time ago that it would be an accommodation to the Senate to have the deficiency bills numbered. Lettering would not do, because there are only twenty-six letters in the alphabet, but numbers run on indefinitely, and will therefore be more convenient for this purpose.

There will probably be no great loss of revenue if we shall come in hereafter and appropriate in some other bill the amount which the conference has agreed to strike out; but I am tired of that sort of thing. My chief objections were to one or two other propositions. The thirty-first amendment, for instance, was—

For printing and binding for the War Department, to be done at the Government Printing Office, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1878, $18,000.

Now what are the facts with reference to this item? The Senate, upon the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations, inserted it in the bill. It was one of the items referred to the conference committee. A majority of the conferees on the part of the Senate have receded from that proposition. Under what circumstances? Let me tell you. There are no funds now at the command of the War Department for its printing. They estimated for 1878 $149,850 for that purpose, and in harmony with our custom for two or three years past to reduce appropriations and call it economy, no matter what the service required, to provide for deficiency bills, and try to persuade somebody that we had thereby saved money, we appropriated for the year 1878, instead of $149,000 or somewhere near the required sum, $72,000 for printing for the War Department. They come in and tell us now that they cannot get along with less than from $20,000 to $25,000 more for that purpose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there anything done in printing the rebellion records?

Mr. WINDOM. My impression is that they are carrying it on. The Secretary of War sent the following communication to the Committee on Appropriations:

[From War Department.]

WASHINGTON, March 28, 1878.

To Hon. WILLIAM WINDOM, United States Senate:

The appropriation for public printing for this Department is exhausted. I have asked an additional appropriation of $25,000 to carry the Department through the remainder of the present fiscal year. The public service will be much obstructed if this appropriation is not soon made.

GEO. W. MCCRARY,
Secretary of War.

Bear in mind, Mr. President, that we cut them down last year from $149,000 to $72,000, and now the Secretary of War comes in and says that the public service "will be much obstructed" if we do not give them at least $25,000 for this printing. I took occasion in addition to this information to telegraph to the Secretary of War to send down to the committee—

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask the honorable Senator whence came this estimate of $149,000, or $150,000 in round numbers, that is now to be satisfied by less than $100,000 according to the appropriation by Congress and the estimate of the Secretary of War?

Mr. WINDOM. I suppose the answer to this question is this, that by encroaching upon the wants of next year they can get along with less this year. For instance, in the War Department as well as in the other Departments, but especially in the War Department, there is a very large amount required for printing blanks, blank-books, &c., which are distributed over the country, and I presume that a portion of those can be postponed to next year, and it will simply add to the amount of printing required at that time, so that they can get along with thirty or forty thousand dollars less than the estimate, but a large part of it will come in next year.

Mr. BAYARD. Then I respectfully submit to the honorable Senator that upon an estimate of $150,000 an excess of some 33 per cent. has been discovered which can be dispensed with.

Mr. WINDOM. Can be postponed, not dispensed with.

Mr. BAYARD. With due respect to the Senator, it seems that there is in his mind a mere suggestion that the use of blanks and the like may be postponed the present year.

Mr. WINDOM. I think the Senator does not distinctly understand me and perhaps I did not make myself very clear.

Mr. BAYARD. There was an estimate of $150,000. There was an appropriation of $72,000. There is now a call for $25,000 more, which makes $97,000; and $97,000 it is admitted will carry the Department through the expenses of printing for the present year instead of $150,000.

Mr. WINDOM. Now I will try and make myself understood. I have no doubt that this difference can be accounted for in this way: There is a large number of blank-books and various kinds of blanks that are used by the Army permanently, and I presume that by letting the stock entirely run down and postponing until next year a large amount that can be postponed, and then providing for it next year you may reduce this somewhat more.

But I wanted to say a moment ago, when the Senator from Delaware kindly interrupted me—and I find no fault with it—that I have no doubt the estimates were large. They always are large. I have never defended and do not defend appropriating up to the full amount of the estimates; but a wise discretion should be exercised in that matter, and, unless the War Department was absolutely dishonest in this thing, $72,000 was not a reasonable appropriation upon an estimate of $149,000. They now ask for $25,000 in addition to the $72,000, and they tell us that there is absolutely no money at command to do their printing. Blanks which are necessary for the Quartermaster-General's Office and for the Commissary-General's Office, that have been sent to the Printing Office to be printed, have been suspended because there is not, as the chief clerk told me this afternoon, a dollar appropriated to pay for them. Now, what are you going to do? You are going to send all over the United States to the various posts ordinary stationery and require the men to rule it and make the headings, thereby imposing upon them great labor and expense in excess of the cost of this printing; and this at the risk of a complication in the accounts and various other difficulties arising out of it.

This is only one of the items of printing. There is another with reference to the Army Register. I suppose that the printing of the Army Register could be dispensed with, and you need never print one. The Army Register for the 1st of January has not yet been printed for the want of money. What is this Register? It is a directory of the Army, which is as important to the Army as the directory in a city is to the inhabitants. It comprises what every man in the Army wants to know, and a great many hundreds of thousands of people outside of the Army. Of course you can dispense with it, but it will cause very great inconvenience.

My friend from Maine suggests that it was understood that this appropriation for printing should be put in another appropriation bill, the regular deficiency bill. The seven that we have had and the six or eight that are to come hereafter are the irregulars. When we get the grand regular deficiency bill, then we can put in these items. I do not know how many millions of deficiencies have already been appropriated, but I think the aggregate foots up five or six millions during this Congress.

The Senate has acted deliberately. It has placed amendments on this bill which are recognized by the statement of the chairman of the conference committee to be just and proper; and we are now asked to stultify ourselves by agreeing to strike them out in order that they may be put in some other bill that is to come hereafter, where they will be no more appropriate than they are in this one. I cannot agree to that sort of child's play.

I cannot agree either to the rejection of the thirtieth amendment of the Senate, which provided—

To ascertain the depth of water and width of channel secured and maintained from time to time by James B. Eads, at the South Pass of the Mississippi River, and to enable the Secretary of War to report, during the construction of the work, the payments made from time to time, and the probable times of other payments, and to report during the construction of the work all important facts relating to the progress of the same, materials used, and the character and permanency with which the said jetties and auxiliary works are being constructed, $7,500.

Congress has authorized a contract with Captain James B. Eads for the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi River, and it has agreed to make such examinations and surveys of that work as will inform the Secretary of War when the payments are due to Captain Eads. Unless those surveys and examinations are made, the Secretary of War cannot certify to the execution of the work and Captain Eads cannot receive his pay. I want to say that this work of Mr. Eads I think will be one of the grandest physical triumphs ever achieved on this continent. He has undertaken it at his own risk and expense, receiving no money until he produces certain results. We have agreed to provide the means whereby the Secretary of War shall know whether he has performed those conditions or not. The Secretary of War informs the Committee on Appropriations that this amount is necessary in order to carry on that examination. Let me read the communication from the Secretary of War dated March 21, 1878:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, March 21, 1878.

The Secretary of War has the honor to transmit to the Senate a communication from the Chief of Engineers, dated March 16, 1878, recommending that an appropriation be made for continuing the examinations required by section 4 of the act of March 3, 1875, (18 Statutes, 463-466,) in connection with the construction of jetties at the South Pass of the Mississippi River.

The necessity for this appropriation is apparent when it is considered that payments to Mr. James B. Eads can only be made upon the report of the officer detailed to examine the works.

GEO. W. MCCRARY,
Secretary of War.

And he submitted with that letter a communication from General Humphreys, Chief of Engineers, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, D. C., March 16, 1878.

SIR: On January 4, 1878, upon the recommendation of this office, the sum of $3,500 was allotted from the appropriation for examinations and surveys and contingencies of rivers and harbors to enable the engineer officer detailed for the duty to continue the examinations in regard to depth of water and width of channel required by Congress in connection with the construction of jetties at the South Pass, Mississippi River, to March 31, 1878, in the expectation that before that period Congress would have made the necessary appropriation for the work. The allotment above mentioned will soon be exhausted, and it is necessary that funds for continuing the examinations be provided at an early day.

The estimate for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, was $15,000. (Book of Estimates for 1878-79, page 22.)

It is respectfully suggested that the attention of Congress be called to the necessity for making the appropriation referred to, in order that the examinations in connection with the jetties may not be discontinued.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. A. HUMPHREYS,
Brigadier-General and Chief of Engineers,

HON. GEORGE W. MCCRARY,
Secretary of War.

I addressed a telegram to the Chief of Engineers this afternoon on this point. I will read his answer:

[From War Department.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 25, 1878.

HON. WILLIAM WINDOM,
United States Senate:

The last appropriation for examination and surveys at South Pass, Mississippi River, was exhausted some time since, and funds have been provided temporarily from the appropriation for examinations and surveys and contingencies of rivers and harbors. This appropriation is not properly applicable to that object, and it is a stretch of authority to use it in that way, which the Secretary of War ought not to be obliged to resort to, or the Chief of Engineers be compelled to recommend him. Please see Executive Document 46, Senate, present session.

A. A. HUMPHREYS,
Chief of Engineers.

The meaning of that, as I take it, reading the two communications together, is simply this: the first one intimates if this appropriation be not made the work of examination will have to be discontinued; the second communication says he believes it is a stretch of authority to use other funds for this purpose. The result of it will be if Congress refuses to make this appropriation—at least I fear it will—that these examinations will be discontinued, and when Captain Eads asks to have his certificate from the Secretary of War for services which he has fairly and honestly rendered to the Government in the achievement of one of the grandest results ever achieved in this country he will be told "There is no fund to make an examination and you must wait for your money." If that be the result of it, it will be one of the most contemptible acts of repudiation that any Government was ever guilty of. There is great danger that this is precisely what this conference report provides for, and hence I cannot consent to it.

But, Mr. President, with a brief reference to one other proposition in the bill I shall relieve the Senate, and I am very free to say that the item upon which I now propose to make a few remarks is the one which I was most reluctant to yield. It is the sixteenth amendment of the Senate:

District of Columbia:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and directed to advance to the commissioners of the District of Columbia $75,000 for the support of the public schools of the District, to be available immediately; and said commissioners shall refund the amount so advanced out of any revenues of the District for the current fiscal year.

We have been told by the honorable Senator from Maine that one of the reasons why he was willing to yield this point was that a statement was inadvertently made to the Senate when the bill was on its passage which proves to have been incorrect. This is undoubtedly true. It was incorrect through inadvertence; but I submit to my honorable friend from Maine whether it would not have been as well to have allowed the Senate to reconsider its action with the benefit of the facts before it. This could have been done by a disagreement in the conference. For my part I did not vote for this proposition originally because the money had been paid back that was appropriated for 1877. I did not suppose when the $75,000 was appropriated last year it ever would be paid back. The conditions of the bill were such that I did not expect it to be repaid. The provision was, as stated by the Senator from Maine, that it should be paid out of any funds not needed for other purposes. Everybody knows that there was no expectation that it would ever be repaid under those circumstances.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask the honorable Senator was it not stated here in debate that the reason for the presence of that item in the bill was that the previous advance had been paid back?

Mr. WINDOM. I do not remember that it was so stated. I think not. I do not think that was stated as the reason. It was stated, however, as I said, through misapprehension that it had been paid back. I was astonished when I heard the statement, because I knew what the provision of the bill was, and I was surprised to hear that there had been $75,000 of the funds of this District which were not needed for other purposes. I was surprised when informed that it had been paid back, and I expressed some surprise to the honorable Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. DORSEY. That was not the exact wording of the amendment of last year. It was that this money should be paid back out of the revenues raised by taxation not necessary for the current expenses of the District government.

Mr. WINDOM. That is a little more accurate than my statement; I had not the words before me, and I am obliged to the Senator for giving me the exact verbiage. I think it means precisely the same thing. "Not needed for actual current expenses of the District" meant the same thing as I stated.

Now I submit to the Senator from Maine that, finding that the Senate had acted upon a misapprehension and this being an important matter, it would have been as well for the committee on the part of the Senate in this conference to disagree and submit the question to the Senate, and if the Senate upon a deliberate vote and upon full information on the subject had rejected the proposition, of course it would have been acquiesced in by everybody.

But, Mr. President, I care not whether the $75,000 was repaid or not; I insist that it is the duty of the Government to appropriate that much as a contribution to the support of the schools in this District. It is true the amendment under discussion does not make an appropriation as a contribution. By the amendment suggested, I think, by the honorable Senator from North Carolina, it was provided:

And said commissioners shall refund the money so advanced out of any revenues of the District for the current fiscal year.

Here is an imperative requirement that this money be repaid out of the receipts of the current fiscal year. It is no donation, no gift; it is a mere advance of funds, a loan which must be repaid. It is proposed to be made because the discussion in the Senate disclosed the fact that the schools must be closed if it be not made. Now, how do we stand on this proposition? With the statement distinctly made by the commissioners of the District and by the school board that within a very few days, by the close of this month at least, the schools of this District will be closed unless we advance $75,000 to be repaid out of the funds collected by the District, we deliberately say, "Close your schools for the next two months, turn the twenty thousand children on the street, for we will not advance the sum of $75,000 or any other sum to the District of Columbia even though it be repaid in two or three months." That is precisely what this conference report means. It means that the schools of this District shall be closed; for, as we all know, a separate appropriation for this purpose will not pass. If it is not appropriate on this deficiency bill it will not be so on any other; and the same reasons which will defeat it now, will defeat it in any other bill. It is not the form but the substance of the amendment that provokes opposition. We may just as well meet the facts squarely now. If we mean that the schools in this District shall be suspended two months before the end of the school year, let us say so by agreeing to this conference report. There is no legal obligation resting upon us to appropriate anything for this purpose, but to refuse it is to repudiate a moral obligation much stronger than any mere legal obligation can be. This is no new thing. The obligation to contribute to support of schools in this District was recognized a quarter of a century ago.

Let me call attention to a report made on this subject in 1856 by Mr. Albert G. Brown, of Mississippi. After a careful examination of the question the Committee on the District of Columbia, through Mr. Brown, reported a great many very interesting facts showing the relation of this District to the General Government. This report was made in "the good old democratic days," I will say to my friend from Delaware, who did me the honor to give me his attention some time ago. The committee, I think, unanimously reported that the Government should contribute one-half the expense of supporting the schools in this District. The reasons assigned, among others, are because the Government owns one-half the property, because from the sale of lots alone reserved by the Government it had received the sum of $707,190.69, and of this sum it had appropriated $686,636.21 for the erection of public buildings. There are various other facts stated, showing that the Government ought in equity and fair dealing to make the contribution, and the Senate acting upon the report passed a bill, almost unanimously, appropriating one-half the funds necessary to support the schools.

Mr. BAYARD. What was the amendment?

Mr. WINDOM. The amount I do not now remember, but that has nothing to do with it, I will say to the honorable Senator. There was not the same reason then that Congress should do this thing that exists to-day, and the question as to whether it was $10,000 or $500,000 has nothing whatever to do with the equities of the case.

Mr. BECK. I desire to ask the Senator from Minnesota from what committee Mr. Brown made his report?

Mr. WINDOM. The Committee on the District of Columbia. The report is headed:

Report.—To accompany S. 214.

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred "the memorial of the board of trustees of public schools of Washington City, District of Columbia, praying a donation of city lots for educational purposes, or that a portion of the proceeds of sales of lots heretofore made may be invested for that purpose," have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report.

This heading is very suggestive, and I am very glad the Senator has called my attention to it. It seems that as long ago as 1856 the District of Columbia petitioned Congress to treat its people as it was treating the new States and Territories of the United States; that is, to make a donation out of property it held here, for the support of schools, or else to appropriate money for this purpose.

I will read the report:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred "the memorial of the board of trustees of public schools of Washington City, District of Columbia, praying a donation of city lots for educational purposes, or that a portion of the proceeds of sales of lots heretofore made may be invested for that purpose," have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report:

That there remains unsold one hundred and ninety lots in the city of Washington, valued at $15,615; but that they stand pledged for an indebtedness equal in amount to their entire value.—(See appendix, A and B.) The first prayer of the memorialists cannot, therefore, with propriety be granted.

The sales of lots heretofore made have produced, as near as can now be ascertained, the net sum of $707,190.69. Of this sum, $686,636.21 has been paid into the hands of various Commissioners of Public Buildings, and by them expended in the erection of the Capitol, President's house, Treasury, and War Offices, and in building wharves and bridges, repairing and opening streets, avenues, &c. (See appendix A.) The remaining $21,554.48 was paid into the Treasury, and has been applied, under the twelfth section of the act of May 17, 1848, to amend the city charter, (see appendix C.) to opening, repairing, and keeping in order the streets, avenues, footways, &c., in the city of Washington. It thus appears that there remains unexpended no part of the fund arising from the sale of lots heretofore made in this city. The second prayer of the memorialists must, consequently, be denied.

Your committee appreciate the importance of education everywhere, and have therefore entered on the investigation of the subject, so far as it is embraced in the memorial, with a sincere desire to recommend some scheme that should advance the educational interests and prospects of the metropolis.

It has been ascertained that there were in attendance last year on the public schools in this city 2,170 scholars, consisting of nearly equal numbers of boys and girls. The number of schools was 32; teachers 38—females 33, males 5. It is estimated that the city requires accommodation for double the number of pupils now at school, and with sufficient pecuniary aid to enable the commissioners to build houses and employ teachers, 4,000 children would be put to school the present year. Only about one-half that now apply can be received. (See appendix D.)

The sum expended last year was $25,291.66. This fund was raised as follows: 6 per cent. on the permanent school fund, $3,030; the poll (or voting) tax of $1 on each voter, $5,330; appropriation from the city treasury, $16,761. This sum is exclusive of the expenditures for houses. Since 1845, when the present school system went into operation, the city has expended $20,000 in the purchase and erection of school-houses. The deficiency of houses is still very great, and is in fact the chief source of embarrassment to the present system.

Your committee have found the schools in Washington in the main well conducted, and on a plan which gives satisfaction to the almost entire community.

With these facts before us, and with the full conviction that the present school fund is altogether insufficient to meet the demands upon it, your committee have felt it to be their duty to ascertain if some proper plan could not be devised for increasing the fund. They have found a healthy state of public opinion in Washington City on this subject, the largest property-holders coming forward and freely consenting to and even urging a tax for school purposes. A tax of this kind must necessarily fall, in a great degree, on those who have only a contingent or resulting interest in keeping up free schools. The rich can and will educate their own children. It must be the poor who pay no taxes who derive the first and immediate advantages from public schools.

The assessed value of real estate in this city is $25,508 78. It is proposed to levy a special school tax of a mill on the dollar upon this property. This would raise a fraction over $25,000 annually.

Your committee has no means of ascertaining accurately the value of Government property within the city limits, but it is believed to be nearly or quite equal to the value of the private property within the same limits. Your committee do not propose a tax on Government property; but they have thought, if private persons having only a remote interest in the education of the poor are willing to submit to a tax on their property for educational purposes, the Government, which has an equal or greater interest in the same subject, might make its contribution to that object.

It is fair to say that citizens of Washington have the same interest in whatever belongs to the Government as citizens of equal fortune in the States, and that they contribute pro rata to the contents of the Treasury. It follows that, in proportion to their numbers and wealth, they contribute as much of what may be expended by the Government for schools here as any like number of persons of like wealth anywhere else.

And then, if on account of their close proximity to the schools they pay a special tax for that special advantage, it would seem that they have obtained no special favor.

It may be said that Congress has no more right to appropriate money for schools in the District than it has to make like appropriations for like purposes in the States. Your committee forbear to discuss the question of power in this connection, or to draw the lines which mark the jurisdiction of Congress in the District and in the States. Nor will your committee dwell on the fact that in all the new States especially Congress has made the most munificent land grants to schools and colleges. If it shall be assumed that Congress is as much restricted in the District as in the States, then, we say, if Congress owns one-half the taxable property in a State, and means to hold it in perpetuity, it ought to submit to taxation on that property for the support of schools, or else contribute from the general fund a sum equal to the amount paid by private persons in the State for that object.

In accordance with the views here expressed your committee report a bill.

Sir, I am somewhat earnest on this subject, and I will tell you why. Among the reasons, I represent a State which has been dealt with munificently by this Government so far as schools are concerned. The Government donated to that State, and to nearly if not quite all the new States, one acre in every eighteen of the public domain. Sections 16 and 36 in every township was donated for that purpose. While this thing was being done in the new Territories and States the people of the District of Columbia, over which the Government has absolute control, as much so as it has over its arsenals, forts, or dock-yards, came to Congress and humbly asked the same generous treatment which the new States received. They said: "You have a large amount of property here. You have already sold over seven hundred thousand dollars' worth of it, and received it into the Treasury. Now give us a portion of these remaining lots for school purposes, or, if you will not do that, make an appropriation of money for that purpose."

The committee, as we have seen, recommended that a money contribution should be made, and the Senate approved that recommendation, as I am informed, although I have not seen the bill referred to. Senators can easily find it by reference to the files. The Senate did pass that bill, making an appropriation of one-half the funds necessary.

Mr. BAYARD. Twelve thousand five hundred dollars.

Mr. WINDOM. Twelve thousand five hundred dollars, my friend says. Does that make any difference? There were then about two thousand scholars in the District of Columbia enrolled. To-day there are some twenty-one or twenty-two thousand. Is this Government so poor that it will make the amount necessary to do an act of justice the condition upon which it shall be done? Shall it be said that it was proper enough in 1856 to appropriate $12,500, but that it is improper now because the amount asked is $75,000? This bill does not propose to appropriate one-half, it proposes only 20 per cent. of the amount necessary to support these schools, and that, as my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] says, is to be paid back. This amendment does not propose to donate anything; it merely advances $75,000 rather than close the schools, but expressly requires its repayment.

I said that it was only about 20 per cent. that we propose to advance as a temporary loan. Let us see. The total expenditure for 1877 for schools in this District was $370,996.26. The total expenditure for this year will be, if the schools are not closed, about the same amount, $370,000. Now, the proposition is to loan for a little while, until they can pay it back, $75,000 or about one-fifth, 20 per cent. of the amount which the District raises for that purpose, and yet even that proposition finds objectors here!

Let us look for a single moment at some of the obligations that rest upon us in this matter. The whole number of scholars enrolled in this District is 21,264. Of these, there were white children, 14,026; colored children, 7,238. Why did those colored children come here in such large numbers? They were invited here by our own laws. They were induced to come here, many of them, because the educational advantages which we said should be given to them were greater here than elsewhere. In 1864 we passed the following act:

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That any white resident of said county shall be privileged to place his or her child or ward at any one of the schools provided for the education of white children in said county, he or she may think proper to select, with the consent of the trustees of both districts; and any colored resident shall have the same rights with respect to colored schools.

Then we provided further:

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the said commissioners to provide suitable and convenient houses or rooms for holding schools for colored children, to employ and examine teachers therefor, and to appropriate a proportion of the school funds, to be determined by the numbers of white and colored children between the ages of six and seventeen years, to the payment of teachers' wages, to the building or renting of school-rooms and other necessary expenses pertaining to said schools, to exercise a general supervision over them, to establish proper discipline, and to endeavor to promote a thorough, equitable, and practical education of colored children in said county.

Then we provided again:

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That the first section of the act of Congress entitled "An act providing for the education of colored children in the cities of Washington and Georgetown, District of Columbia, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and that from and after the passage of this act it shall be the duty of the municipal authorities of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, to set apart each year from the whole fund received from all sources by such authorities, applicable, under existing provisions of law, to purposes of public education, such a proportionate part thereof as the number of colored children, between the ages of six and seventeen years, in the respective cities bear to the whole number of children thereof, for the purpose of establishing and sustaining public schools in said cities for the education of colored children.

In 1864 we said to the colored people in the bordering States of Virginia and Maryland, which do not provide very liberally for their education, "Come over into this District; bring all your children here; and we will educate them." Ay, Mr. President, not we will educate them—no, sir, but "We will make the people of this District, who own only half the property in it, build school-houses for them; set aside one-third of all their funds to educate them; but we will not contribute a dollar toward it; nor will we even advance the small sum that may be necessary to keep those schools open when an overburdened people cannot raise the money to do it." When we have invited these people here, when we have filled the District with colored children because of our legislation, is it fair, is it honest, is it honorable on the part of this Government to refuse to make any contribution whatever toward their education? What unbounded liberality on our part to pass laws offering an education to all the colored children of Maryland and Virginia and elsewhere who chose to come here, and then refuse to pay any part of the expense! How generous to impose this entire burden on the people of the District! You have the power to do it, Mr. President, but is it honest, is it just, is it honorable?

The schools in this District have been as economically conducted as any in any other city, and there is no ground for objecting on that score. The total per annum expense is $370,000; the average enrollment is about twenty thousand, making the cost per year per scholar only about $18.50. This includes rent—amounting to more than $25,000—fuel, teachers' salaries, and all other expenditures. I have a table making a comparative statement of the cost of education in this District with any other portion of the country, and with the permission of the Senate I will hand it to the Reporter without stopping to read it. It shows that the District is as economical in the management of its educational interests as any other city in the Union almost.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is that the cost of the education of the children is not greater than elsewhere.

Mr. WINDOM. It is not as great per capita as in most cities. I think I will read it. "With a view of showing the comparative cost of education based on the average daily attendance of pupils in several large cities, the following table has been compiled from the report of the United States Commissioner of Education:"

	Cities.	Tuition.	Incidental expenses.	Total cost.
1	Boston.....	$25 94	$10 21	$36 15
2	San Francisco.....	24 61	6 57	31 18
3	New York.....	21 99	5 64	27 63
4	New Orleans.....	21 90	5 12	27 02
5	Pittsburgh.....	16 00	10 00	26 00
6	Saint Louis.....	19 62	5 72	25 34
7	Cincinnati.....	20 80	3 50	24 30
8	Indianapolis.....	17 38	6 66	24 04
9	Washington and Georgetown.....	15 11	7 79	22 90

That was the expense of 1875, when the number of scholars was smaller, the number of school-houses required about the same, and the cost now is only about $18.50 instead of $22.90, as then—

10	Louisville.....	16 46	6 32	22 78
11	Cleveland.....	16 74	5 84	22 58
12	Chicago.....	16 39	3 39	19 78
13	Detroit.....	13 74	5 33	19 07

In this matter of tuition in this District, all the charges are included for incidentals, for the rent of buildings, which is large, and for fuel, and various other incidental and necessary expenses of education. It comprehends the whole expense.

There is another reason which operates upon my mind in favor of making some fair and equitable contribution toward the expenses of the common schools in this District. I have said that about one-third of the pupils are colored; I have shown you by what assurances many of them were induced to come here. These people are poor; I presume there is not property enough owned by the parents of that one-third of the pupils of the common schools to pay for the support of a single school of the kind that is maintained up here. The schools for colored children as well as for white in this District are an honor to the country. There are very few places in the United States where they are better managed than they are here. In addition to the large number of colored pupils who by our own statute were induced to come here, and who were also thrown upon the District by thousands as the result of the war, we have another class of people here whose children we should not require the District to educate wholly at its own expense.

About 30 per cent. of the scholars in these schools are the children of officers and employes of various kinds of the Government of the United States—people who are brought here because the Government is here, people who are living upon salaries, and who have very little property which contributes to taxation. A very large proportion of them are clerks in the Departments who do not have a legal residence, who go home to vote. One-third nearly of all the scholars are children of that class of people. As my friend from Massachusetts suggests, they must be here or others in their places. Is it fair for us to impose on the people of this District, the tax-payers, the entire responsibility of educating this 30 per cent. of people who are brought here in that way, and who contribute very little, if anything, to the taxation of the District? I submit, then, to the sense of fair play of every Senator—and I know that whatever his vote may be in his heart he responds—that it is not fair or honorable that we should compel them to do this thing. Is it fair, is it right that the parents of one-third of the children of the District should be compelled to support the other two-thirds composed of the colored pupils who are brought here by our instrumentality, and the 30 per cent. of whites who are here continuously in the service of the Government, but who pay no taxes of any consequence. I think not. I cannot so vote, and hence could not give my consent to this conference report.

Mr. President, there are one or two other points that I want to suggest in connection with this subject. The District of Columbia is often spoken of in this body and elsewhere as a sort of mendicant, always in debt, always behind, always at the doors of Congress for assistance. This is simply a gratuitous libel on the people of your capital city, and as a citizen of this Republic I repel it. There is another side to this matter, Mr. President, as I will briefly show you. The facts that I present now are from a statement signed by eighteen of the most prominent citizens of the District of Columbia. I will not read their names but they are all well known. They are men whose word you would take on any subject, and I apprehend the facts they state are substantially correct. They are the representatives of the committee of one hundred chosen by the District of Columbia to present its case to Congress. Let me read one or two extracts from that statement:

A careful inquiry into the comparative expenditures by the local and Federal Governments, for streets, sewers, and other improvements for the common benefit, shows that while the appropriations by Congress for these objects, up to the present, do not exceed $6,000,000, the District Government has expended for the same purposes not less than $35,000,000; which sum is represented by a debt of about $23,000,000, and the balance of $12,000,000 has been furnished, in cash, by the tax-payers of the District.

Now, Mr. President, who owns these streets? The Government of the United States has so complete and absolute an ownership over every street and avenue in this District that it can close any one at pleasure; it can sell or lease it to anybody it pleases. It has the entire and absolute ownership of every street in the District, and yet for the improvement of our own streets and other purposes of internal improvement in a city where we own, as the best estimate shows, 50 per cent. of all the property the government of the District has paid $35,000,000 and the Government of the United States $6,000,000. Is the District of Columbia, then, wholly a mendicant begging at our doors for crumbs? No, Mr. President. The circumstances I have mentioned prove either that this so-called "mendicant" has contributed more than its share and this Government has declined to assume its fair share of responsibility. It has shirked its obligations because it had the power to do so.

I read again from this statement:

It further appears, that these expenditures by the local government, except $9,000,000 expended prior to 1871, were made, and $15,000,000 of this oppressive debt contracted by agents of the United States, over whom the citizens of the District had no control whatever, and for whose acts, therefore, they are in no manner responsible.

Here is another point well worthy of our consideration. With the exception of $9,000,000 prior to 1871, this debt was contracted through our own agents. We appointed the board of public works. We authorized the people of the District of Columbia to elect a house of delegates, but they did not have control over the legislation of the District, because, if I recollect aright, we appointed the council, the so-called senate of the District of Columbia.

Mr. DAWES. Not "we."

Mr. WINDOM. Yes "we;" the President and the Senate of the United States did it. We appointed our own board of public works; we appointed the governor; we appointed the council which had a veto upon the acts of the lower house; and then, because we allowed them to elect delegates to the lower house, we said they are responsible for this vast debt, and therefore we will not contribute a cent toward it!

Mr. President, we had complete power over this District all the time this debt was being contracted. Our own agents incurred this debt. Our own agents piled this heavy load upon the people of this District, under which they are groaning to-day, and by reason of which they are unable to raise taxes enough to keep their schools open all the year; and after our own agents had imposed this burden upon them and these people come and say to us, "We cannot raise money enough to keep these schools open the entire year; loan us $75,000 until the commencement of next year, when we can raise our taxes, and we will pay it back to you," we say, "No; you may close your schools and turn the twenty thousand children on the streets." This report of the conference committee says just that thing. I cannot assent to any such injustice as that, and I hope the Senate will not do it.

Take the proportion of expense which the Government bears for another purpose in this District. As I have said, we own all the streets, we own all these reservations in the District. Who pays for lighting these streets, and these reservations, and these public grounds? Congress does not do it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do they not pay part for the Avenue?

Mr. WINDOM. I do not know about that. I will read the statement of this committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think Congress pays for one-third of lighting the Avenue.

Mr. WINDOM. Congress pays for one-third of lighting the Avenue, as I am informed by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee. I will read the figures with reference to the public lighting of the city:

Nearly the entire expense of lighting the cities of Washington and Georgetown, including lamps on streets around the public grounds and buildings, is paid by the District government. The United States pays for no lamps except those located on the public reservations.

I ought to add, as I am also informed by the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. DORSEY,] that the Government pays for lighting one-third of the Avenue. It pays nothing for the lamps.

About $163,000 were expended for light during the past year, and of this sum the Government paid but $6,312.40.

Is it right, the Government owning one-half the property, owning all the streets and reservations which are lighted, that we should pay $6,312.40 and require the District to pay $163,000?

But again, it is not true that this District has contributed nothing to the support of the Government:

The people of this District have also, since 1863—

I read again from this document—paid into the Treasury of the United States, under the internal-revenue law, $4,635,119, or more than has been paid by all the other Territories combined—more than has been paid by the States of Arkansas, Florida, Kansas, Minnesota, Nebraska, or Oregon.

But how differently we treat this District, which is completely and absolutely under our control, from what we do these States! It has contributed more to the Government than any of them in money, but when we organized those States we gave them one acre in every eighteen for schools. In my own State, if we shall continue to husband the school fund as providently as heretofore, in a very few years it will pay the entire expense of maintaining the schools in the State.

Mr. DAWES. It does pay the expense in Michigan.

Mr. WINDOM. I am informed that the grant of public lands in the State of Michigan does already entirely support their common schools. How it is that Senators, especially those who come from new States where these munificent grants have been made for schools, can deny to this District the poor pittance they ask to-day in the shape of a loan for a few months, in order to avoid closing these schools, I cannot understand.

If the report of this conference committee is to be adopted, notwithstanding these claims, notwithstanding the injustice which is done to these people, the schools will be closed within the next ten days, and the children turned out upon the streets. Is that desirable in a political point of view, or in any other point of view? The two months that these children will lose now can never be regained; they are lost forever; they will be the poorer forever by our refusing to do justice as we are asked to do to-day by voting down this report of the conference committee and giving us another chance to ascertain whether the House of Representatives are willing to do justice in this matter or not.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I was a member of the conference committee, and as such desire to reply somewhat to the speech made by the Senator from Minnesota, our chairman, who was also a member of the conference committee. I think he has done both the House of Representatives and the conferees on the part of the Senate injustice in his presentation of the case; and I believe I can satisfy the Senate that he has. He began his opposition to the report by a tirade reflecting somewhat on the House of Representatives because of the unwarranted, improper, unprecedented manner, as he said, in which they have sent deficiency bills here, intimating that they ought to be classified; that seven had come already, and others, perhaps many, were incubating, and that the unwarranted and unusual conduct of the House of Representatives in this regard ought to meet with the reprobation of the Senate; ought to be frowned down and discounted. The fact is, Mr. President, that the House of Representatives has sent over those deficiency bills from time to time, although a majority of that body is not in accord with the Administration, at the earnest, urgent request of the different Departments of the Government, who have assured that House that if the deficiency appropriations were postponed until the regular deficiency bill was considered they could not carry on the necessary work of their Departments. I hold the bills in my hand that the House sent here, and they will show for themselves that my statements are correct. The first—at the extra session—was the naval deficiency bill, $2,240,000. The men of the Navy had been unpaid, and the service was suffering because of wrongs done by the misappropriations and illegal uses of money whereby these men were deprived of their pay. I do not propose to go into that.

Mr. SARGENT. I hope my friend will allow me one moment.

Mr. BECK. I do not want to go into these matters.

Mr. SARGENT. There was no such pretense made in any body that assembled in this Capitol. It was shown, and shown clearly, and was asserted that the deficiency was on account of the insufficient appropriation heretofore made.

Mr. BECK. I do not want to go into the details of that matter.

Mr. SARGENT. I merely correct the statement, and do not desire the Senator to go into the details if he does not wish to do so.

Mr. BECK. I repeat again that the money that was voted for one purpose was used for another, in plain violation of law.

Mr. SARGENT. That is entirely groundless.

Mr. BECK. I will not discuss it. Let the statement go for what it is worth. But the House of Representatives were in duty bound to send us that bill. I ask the Senator from California if they were not?

Mr. SARGENT. I think so.

Mr. BECK. Was it not just to the men in the Navy that the deficiency bill should be passed?

Mr. SARGENT. Unquestionably it was.

Mr. BECK. Then what I desire to show the Senator from Minnesota is that bill No. 1 is not liable to the criticism which he makes.

Mr. SARGENT. We do not agree. I want to say that in the previous year we had appropriated less than the estimates.

Mr. BECK. I do not care to speak about these things. I am answering the Senator from Minnesota. The next deficiency was a bill to pay judgments of the Court of Claims, and for the absolute necessities of the Government growing out of the extra session of Congress. It was sent by the House to this body, containing a few items for cases of urgent necessity, and was added to largely in this body; another was a bill, that we passed upon the other day, for temporary clerks, and to guard the timber lands of the United States, and for other purposes, requiring prompt action. The next, and that was the fourth, was a miscellaneous appropriation for the expenses of the House and Senate, which both Houses demanded, saying that they could not carry on the business of the two Houses without it. The other was one which the Senator from Minnesota himself had passed yesterday, appropriating $200,000 for the public printing and binding, which he assured us was necessary and that unless it was done even the RECORD could not be published. These are all the bills of this character which the House has sent, except the bill now before us, and in sending these from time to time, the Senator from Minnesota has seen fit to endeavor to show to the Senate that the House had done wrong, and in some way violated established precedents; he desired to have them numbered and said he was tired of such conduct, and did not want them to anticipate the regular deficiency bill and give it in broken doses in the way they were doing. I say that he is unfair to the other House.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the Senator please repeat how many bills of this character he said we have received from the House?

Mr. BECK. The naval appropriation bill is one; the bill to pay judgments of the Court of Claims is two; for temporary clerks, three; the miscellaneous bill for the Senate and House, four; for printing and binding, five; and this one is six; each one of them being absolutely necessary on account of the demands made by the Departments of the Government on the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. WINDOM. It is possible that I may have made a mistake, and that there were only six instead of seven; but they have confused me so with their number that I am excusable if I am mistaken.

Mr. BECK. The reason that number has been sent here was because the Departments of the Government, with which the gentleman is in accord, have demanded the bills from the House. When this bill came before us it came, as the conferees on the part of the House, republicans and democrats, alike, assured us, because the heads of Departments appeared before them and said, "We cannot wait for the regular deficiency bill; these are things that must now be provided for." In this bill the Senate has provided for all the items, as the House has provided for all the items, necessary to carry on its business. The Patent Office declared that they could not go on unless they had $30,000 or $40,000 to supply what they lost by the fire, that the models could not be restored and patentees would be unable to obtain their rights unless we gave the Department something like what they demanded immediately. Therefore, the House, in anticipation of the regular deficiency bill, provided for that. The next thing the House provided for was in the Treasury Department for the storage of the silver dollar. We had passed a law making that absolutely necessary, and the officers could not wait for the regular deficiency bill. The next thing the House provided for was for carrying on the Coast Survey service and triangulations. The next was $40,000 for surveyors, gaugers, and other expenses of the Internal Revenue department. The next was for the public buildings, the construction of which they believed could be carried on more cheaply now than ever before, and they made appropriations to be available immediately, so that the months of April, May, and June should not be lost when labor could be cheaply had and the people and the Government be equally benefited.

These things, together with some aid that they desired to give the Army in its transportation, is the whole bill with the exception of a few items for the navy-yard and the hospitals of the Navy that were sent here by the House in this bill. The committee of the House assured us that they were enabled to pass the bill through the House in advance of the regular deficiency bill which is now almost ready and will be reported before next week passes, and upon the assurance that they would put in nothing that was not absolutely and indispensably necessary and that wherever anything could wait for the regular deficiency bill it should wait, it was under those circumstances that the present bill was sent here by the House; yet complaint is made against them for doing that. I insist that the House of Representatives has acted toward this administration with great liberality and deserve commendation instead of censure. They have shown a desire to do all that was necessary for carrying on all the Departments of the Government and have indicated no desire to cripple them, and no desire to embarrass them, but on the contrary with every desire to aid them. Yet these bills are made the ground of accusation against the majority of the House.

When those bills came to us the officers of the different Departments appeared before our committee and they told us of other things that were necessary. The chief officer of the Insane Asylum appeared and said that so many insane people were being sent to his asylum that he was obliged to have more money or he could not provide for them. The representatives of the House agreed to that, although he had not appeared before them. When the managers of the Freedmen's Hospital showed us that they had a contract for rent whereby they were entitled to $4,000 annual rent and had only received $2,000 we showed the contract to the House conferees and they agreed to give that sum; they stood by the contract. When we came to consider the mint in California and at Denver and the assay office at Boisé City to determine what was necessary they consulted the Director of the Mint, and while we had made larger allowances than they thought it proper to make, they brought us the assurance of the Director of the Mint himself that the sums finally agreed upon were the sums which he said were satisfactory, and they agreed to all of them. When we came to the Light-House establishment and put in an appropriation of $15,000 for Portsmouth Harbor, New Hampshire, showing that we had information that one of the signal-lights was about to be washed away and the light-house had become unsafe and it was necessary to make repairs immediately or shipwrecks might take place on that coast, the House at once agreed to it, and it is in this bill now. So in regard to nearly everything that we satisfied them was absolutely necessary they agreed to it.

When we showed them the provision we had made to advance $300,000 to buy supplies for the Army necessary to go to the posts of the Upper Missouri and to be carried up the Missouri River while freights were low, during the month of June, instead of paying double rates in July and August, the House agreed to that and the $300,000 is provided for in anticipation of the regular Army bill, because we were satisfied that we would save from fifty to one hundred thousand dollars by making the advance. When we took up the amendment for taking care of the Des Moines Rapids Canal, which is a great public work, in which all the people from New Orleans to Saint Paul and from Pittsburgh to the mouth of the Ohio are interested, the House conferees said that was right, and that too was inserted. So when they came to the deficiency for the Marine Corps the necessity of the appropriation was made plain and they agreed to it, and even for the expenses of the observation of the eclipse; indeed for all the matters that were necessary the House conferees agreed with us; and they further agreed to pay the government of Canada $11,000 or $12,000 for a deficiency rather than have a misunderstanding with that government in regard to carrying the mails; they were fair and liberal throughout.

Therefore I say, Mr. President, that when the Senator from Minnesota asks the Senate to vote against this bill because he did not get everything into it that he wanted, he is asking the Senate to do an unreasonable thing. It is not a regular deficiency bill and it does not pretend to be. The regular deficiency bill will be before us in a very short time, as the House conferees assured us, and then any item left out of this bill can be fairly considered by both committees, and can be passed upon with a full knowledge of all the facts after due investigation is had. To defeat this bill and deprive the Government of all the items that are therein given, which all the Departments have said are indispensable for them to have at the present time in advance of the regular deficiency bill, is not the part of wisdom, even if the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations insists that the Senate shall defeat it because he thinks other things should be added. He does not object to anything that is done. His only objection is that we did not get all he wanted.

There were some other items which we would have liked to have had inserted. We agreed with the chairman of the committee, who declined to sign the report, that $100,000 would have been better to have been given to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for storekeepers, gaugers, surveyors, and others, than the $40,000 allowed by the House; but the House conferees assured us that they would make a careful examination of that matter, and that they would see that justice was done the Commissioner. They had inserted $40,000 because he needed that amount at present; and he does not pretend that a single distillery has been closed, that the business of the office has been embarrassed, or that it will be embarrassed in the course of the next month if we give him the $40,000 that the House conferees agreed to give; and long before any embarrassment can come up, long before there will be enough demands made for the starting of new distilleries to need the $100,000 inserted by the Senate, there will be other bills before both Houses, especially the regular deficiency bill, in which the Commissioner will be allowed, I have no doubt, every dollar that he asks for. Is this bill to be defeated because $40,000 is given now in advance of the regular deficiency bill, for fear that the Commissioner may be embarrassed hereafter, because we do not make this the regular deficiency bill and appropriate every dollar that the Senator from Minnesota thinks he may want before the end of the year? I think surely not. The Commissioner does not want this bill defeated on that ground, I am very sure. No officer of the Government looking to the good of the service wants to defeat it. That because a Senator does not get all he wants, he would rather defeat the whole bill and get nothing than take the best terms the conferees could agree upon, that does not seem to me to be wise or good policy.

The next item referred to by the Senator from Minnesota is the appropriation to ascertain the depth of the water to be secured and maintained by James B. Eads in the South Pass of the Mississippi River. I agree with him that Mr. Eads is doing a remarkable work; and Mr. Eads will surely get his pay. The Engineer Corps of the Army have set apart, as General Humphreys says, three thousand and odd dollars in order to make these investigations. They want more. Perhaps they will need it, but an investigation into that question can be made by the House and by the Senate long before Mr. Eads will be entitled to or be demanding any more money. It is not, I repeat, a regular deficiency in any proper sense. It might be a very proper thing to insert in this bill or a very good thing to go in the next bill; it can do no harm to give the House time to examine; the Engineer Corps of the Army has very little to do except to attend to that business, and we make very liberal appropriations for all the work they do. I have no doubt they have money enough now to make any measurement or surveys that may be necessary to enable Mr. Eads to carry on his work. Whether they have or not, the House committee claimed the right to look into the matter themselves. They did not understand the subject well enough to act upon it at this time; we did not have sufficient information to satisfy them upon it; and therefore the Senator from Maine and myself thought rather than to lose the bill we would give them the opportunity to look into it, and they might report it in their next bill either in the sundry civil bill, or the regular deficiency bill, or any other bill in which it would be proper to report it after they have made the investigation. All they asked for was time to look into it, time to ascertain what the facts were, time to ascertain what the amount of work was that was really necessary, and when they found what sum it was necessary to appropriate we were assured that justice would be done in that regard. If this whole bill is to be defeated because that item is not agreed to now the Senate will make a great mistake, even if the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations does desire to defeat it rather than to get what it gives.

In regard to the printing and binding for the War Department, there is no doubt that the War Department needs money to carry on its public printing, but there is no doubt, as the conferees on the part of the House assured us, that there has been great extravagance, particularly in the binding, in the War Department, during the last year, that many expensive books were bound and sent all over the country; that they had reduced their appropriation by the extravagant binding of books. There are blanks necessary to be prepared now, and all the House conferees desired was that they should have an opportunity of looking still further to see where the money already appropriated had gone and what was the amount actually necessary, giving the same assurance that they did not understand why so much money should be expended especially for the binding of books in that Department and desiring further time. We could not force them to yield to us, and we thought that it was far better to pass the bill with the valuable provisions it contained than have the conference committee disagree and a new conference ordered, and perhaps the same thing gone over again, with all the other items stricken out finally, because we could not get all we wanted. We were not dealing with children. We had no right to dictate. We were dealing with representative men. They listened to us; we listened to them; and we agreed as far as we could and upon the points we could not agree we thought it was the part of wisdom, rather than to defeat the whole bill, to let the House conferees look into the items still further and perhaps they would be satisfied that we were right. If not, when other bills come here, the Senate has the power of putting in the same items again, and we can then test the question over again.

I believe these are all the items with the exception of the $75,000 for the schools of the District that have been commented upon and objected to by the Senator from Minnesota. It was obviously right under the circumstances, it seems to me, to strike that from this bill, and in doing so the conferees who agreed to report the bill without it neither intended nor do they now propose to offer any antagonism to the schools of the District. The conferees on the part of the House were unanimously opposed to it, earnestly, emphatically so, and the whole bill was to be lost, obviously so, unless that item was stricken out. They had the assurance of the commissioners and they had the assurance of the Secretary of the Treasury that the fact stated upon this floor, no doubt believed by the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. DORSEY,] no doubt believed by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON,] when it was inserted in this bill, that the $75,000 advanced last year had been paid back, was in fact not true, and the commissioners assured the House Committee that it was folly to be lending money with a view of getting it back any more. Therefore, as we had acted under a misapprehension, and as the bill had to be agreed to just as it is now or not at all, we thought that it was better to drop the item out of the bill rather than defeat it altogether. The Senator from Minnesota knows very well that when this item was before the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate we turned it over to the District Committee, refusing to report it from the Committee on Appropriations because it was not a deficiency in any sense. However just, however honest, however desirable it would be to furnish this money, it is a matter that ought to come from the Committee on the District of Columbia, and they admit that they were deceived as to the facts. That committee can meet this afternoon and report a bill for this purpose to-morrow morning, and the chances are that it would pass without unnecessary delay; it could be sent to the House before two o'clock to-morrow afternoon. Under all the circumstances, with the misapprehension that existed as to the fact that last year when we had a provision requiring them to pay it back, although assured on this floor that it had, it has not been paid back, with the assurance of the District commissioners that they are unable to pay it back if we advance, and that they do not propose to do it, and they, I believe, went so far as to say they did not want it if it had to be paid back, it was a proper thing to leave it out of the bill and let it come up as a separate proposition, when all the facts can be accurately ascertained.

All that the Senator from Minnesota says may be true. It may be our duty to do this. It may be that we have not given this District half as much as they are entitled to receive. It may be that we own half the property here. It may be that there are a great many things that ought to be considered, all of which can be considered, and will be considered when the question is submitted to us as a separate proposition; but in the first place all agree that it is not a deficiency. We are under no legal obligation to give this money. It is a separate matter altogether, a matter that must stand upon its own merits. It is either right or wrong; it has nothing to do with the deficiency bill, and ought not to be charged up as a part of the expenses of the Government to show the extravagance of either party in making appropriations. The measure ought to stand upon its merits. It is a thing that ought to be done or not done according as the Congress of the United States may think it is right or wrong to pass it.

I do not propose now to go into the management of the affairs of this District nor to inquire how many colored children are to be appropriated for, nor how many children of the employees of the Government or members of Congress are being educated, nor what the Government gets from its streets and public squares and avenues which it certainly owns and holds for the benefit of the community. There is not a gentleman who owns a fine house fronting a public square that would not pay 20 per cent. more for it because it does face that public square which is ornamented and maintained by the Government for his benefit and for the enjoyment and health of himself and his family. But these are not things necessary to discuss here. The question is not upon its merits as to whether we shall give this $75,000 or not. It is sufficient for the purpose of this bill to say to the Senate that when the House conferees assured us that we had passed it in the Senate upon a false assumption of facts, when we were told that the last money had been paid back, and that this would be paid back, that it was simply a loan, and when the Secretary of the Treasury officially told them that was not the fact, and when the commissioners appeared before them and did not want to accept it upon any such ground, it was a proper thing for the members of the conference committee of both Houses to say, "Well, gentlemen, on that state of fact, we will leave it out of the deficiency bill and bring it before the House and before the Senate in a proper and independent form, so that it can be fairly considered without misunderstanding or without misrepresentation and with all the facts known." When that is done the speech of the Senator from Minnesota will have force. Then his arguments about what we ought to do will all be heeded, will be all carefully weighed. I think he has made his speech at the wrong time.

I am perhaps speaking longer than I ought. I merely desire to say further that, if it is the purpose of the Senate to pass this bill as the conferees agreed upon it, in my judgment they will reach the other items that the Senator from Minnesota wants in a manner much more likely to have them passed, either in an independent form or in some other bill, than they will have the chance to pass by rejecting this bill altogether or by running the risk of conference after conference when perhaps the whole bill will come to naught. There are many things in the bill that ought to become law at once, and because we are unable to get what some Senators think would be very desirable the bill should not be defeated. The question is, what is the best thing to do? My judgment is that it is best to take the bill as agreed upon by the conferees, to which there is very little if any objection as far as we have gone, and either instruct the Committee on the District of Columbia to report a bill that will enable us to aid those schools or rely upon the House of Representatives to do so in the next deficiency bill, or in the sundry civil bill, or in some other form, rather than that this bill should fail when after all the House yielded to as many things as they did and we yielded to them upon proper grounds for investigation of other things. I repeat that I think the conference committee was as free and full and our action was as carefully considered on both sides as either side could well ask, and that the matters that were left out were left out for ample and sufficient reasons.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I would go quite as far as my friend from Minnesota in doing anything possible for the schools of this District or for any other interest in it that it was proper for Congress to patronize and encourage; but I do not want the Senate to think that a mere disagreement to this conference report will secure that appropriation. The House of Representatives (and we are compelled to speak somewhat of it, because this brings us directly into conference with its members) is now considering the subject of the relation that should exist between the General Government and the District. I am disposed to think that the House is approaching the subject in a liberal spirit, and that it does not desire to take a mere piecemeal of an appropriation, to leave open the question whether it is a debt or a gift or an obligation this year or the next or the year after, but to settle it on some permanent basis.

Moreover, Mr. President, I think it is a misapprehension to suppose that the failure of this appropriation is going to close the schools. I do not believe that it can be shown that $10,000 is necessary to keep the schools from closing. They need it, but I do not think there is the remotest possibility of the schools being brought summarily to a close if we fail in this appropriation.

Now, what are the reasons for passing the bill? Here is an appropriation of $1,200,000 needed every hour for the Quartermaster's Department, for which they have been waiting now, in the most absolute need, for a period of more than sixty days. Here are several public buildings of great importance to many large States and communities, the construction of which is brought to a stand-still. Here are appropriations made "for labor and material for the following begun and unfinished public buildings." Here are $100,000 for the custom-house at Chicago. Here are $100,000 for the post-office and custom-house at Cincinnati. Here are $100,000 for the court-house and post-office at Philadelphia. Here are $100,000 for the post-office and sub-treasury at Boston. Here are $100,000 for the custom-house and post-office at Saint Louis. Here are $50,000 for the custom-house and post-office at Fall River. Here are $40,000 for the post-office and custom-house at Nashville; $75,000 for the custom-house and post-office at Hartford, and a great many others that I need not go over. The masons are waiting, trowel in hand, for the money to go on. Labor is absolutely suspended in all these communities, and on the part of these mechanics, for the lack of these appropriations.

Mr. SARGENT. And the Government needs the buildings.

Mr. BLAINE. And the Government needs the buildings, and is in hourly need of them. The Senator from Kentucky spoke very properly of an appropriation, which is not a deficiency in the exact sense, but which the House conferees very generously conceded. A most important light-house and fog-signal station for the coast of New Hampshire has become by the storms of the past winter so unsafe that the keepers cannot remain in it. There passes by that, you may almost say, the commerce of the whole Atlantic coast. The Secretary of the Treasury writes an urgent note that the work of reconstructing it should be begun immediately, and the light-house superintendent says the same thing. I might go over the whole bill. It is filled with matters of the most exigent importance. Here is a matter which the House was not disposed at first to concede to the Senate, an appropriation for the observation of the eclipse of the sun, upon which the Naval Observatory in Washington is in correspondence with all the scientific bodies of Europe, and we should feel in a very awkward condition to have the French Academy and the Royal Observatory at London and other scientific societies sending their agents over here for the eclipse to be observed within our own limits, and our own Government taking no notice of it whatever. To that the House have agreed, the appropriation being $8,000. It is necessary that the preparation should be begun at once; there is no time to be lost.

I might go over the whole bill in this way. Now, should we lose so important a bill as that, involving so many interests to so many communities, on which both branches of Congress and both parties are substantially united, simply because we think we might coerce somebody into granting something the necessity of which absolutely has not been demonstrated? I do hope that we shall accept this report; and, as the Senator from Kentucky has said, and as the House conferees said also, in the regular deficiency bill which is to be reported, as they think within the next seven or eight days, if there be anything here that has been left out that is of pressing importance it may be very easily taken up then and disposed of. But if we defeat this conference report on the idea that we can coerce the House in advance of their determining the whole relation of the District to the General Government, and that we shall be able to coerce the House into granting that appropriation, I think we are proceeding upon a foundation that we shall find is not firm beneath our feet.

Mr. WINDOM. I know the Senate is weary of this discussion, and I will not prolong it more than about two minutes and a half. The coolness with which the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Kentucky tell us that this thing is all right in reference to the schools, even if we did not grant it now, is very refreshing in this warm spring weather. I think both those Senators know perfectly well that no separate bill will ever pass for that purpose. I know as well as I know anything, that unless it be passed in an appropriation bill it will not be passed at all. The Senator says the schools will not be closed even if the appropriation be not made. I should like to know upon what fact he bases that statement.

Mr. BLAINE. I will say, if the Senator consents to an interruption, that there are about two months of the school year remaining. It cannot be shown certainly that there are $75,000 needed for the salaries of teachers for two months in this city, because including the repairs and the fuel and the lights and every conceivable thing the annual expense is $370,000 a year. Therefore it is absurd to say that in this summer season, during the warm weather, when no fuel is required, for two months' salary of teachers $75,000 must be paid or the schools be closed. That $75,000 is needed to keep these schools from closing for the next two months must be a misrepresentation, or a misapprehension, I will call it, on the part of the school board who give us that information. They do not sustain themselves and the figures do not balance at all.

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator's conclusion, then, seems to be based on very poor logic, I think. My information upon the subject is based upon the statement made by the school board, by the superintendent of the public schools, and by one of the commissioners of the District of Columbia, that unless this appropriation be made the schools will stop. I think that is better authority than the argument which the Senator makes based upon his figures. For aught we know, they have their rents to pay and all their ordinary expenses, except for fuel, during the warm weather, and there are two months, about one-fifth of the whole time, yet remaining, and that would make just about the proportion they need.

The Senator from Maine makes a somewhat fitting argument on the subject of the pressing items that exist in this bill. And the Senator from Kentucky, too, says the House passed the bill upon a statement made by the member who managed it that the bill contained items of the most pressing necessity. The Senator from Maine read some of those items which are of pressing necessity, which are for custom-houses in the various cities of the Union—for instance, "For labor and material for the following begun and unfinished public buildings;" and there are some fifteen or twenty of them; I do not remember the number.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is more important than keeping up the schools!

Mr. WINDOM. Of course it is. Here is one item to which I should like to call attention:

Custom-house, New Orleans, Louisiana, for continuation of building, $10,000.

My best information and belief is that they have been "continuing" that custom-house at New Orleans for the last forty years. Here is one of the pressing necessities more important than to maintain the schools in the District! Another pressing necessity is rather amusing, that is that we shall give $8,000 to send somebody away off on the plains to watch the eclipse of the sun some time this summer. I am in favor of that proposition; I think it is a proper thing to do; but for a great nation that denies to the children under the shadow of the Dome of its own Capitol the privilege of education to spend money on such an expedition at a cost of $8,000 seems to me absurd.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But perhaps the eclipse of the sun might stop, like the schools, and not come off, unless the appropriation were made!

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator allow me to say that a commissioner of the District, no longer ago than yesterday, assured the Committee on Appropriations of the House that the failure to pass this appropriation of $75,000 in this bill would not necessarily stop their schools, although it would embarrass them, and furthermore that the commissioner said the requirement that they should pay the money back was simply a cheat; that they neither could nor would do it, and they did not intend to pay it back, and in that view we might as well look at the question fairly?

Mr. WINDOM. That is entirely different information from what I have. The Senator's information certainly must be second-hand on that subject, for he is not a member of the Committee on Appropriations of the House. Mine is first hand. My information comes very direct.

Mr. BECK. Mine comes from the members of that committee to whom the statement was made and it was repeated in the presence of the Senator from Minnesota and myself this morning.

Mr. WINDOM. I was present in committee this morning, and if the Senator says it was stated there it is true of course; but I did not hear that statement. I heard a portion of the statement, and it was this: it was said by a commissioner of the District that it was folly to suppose they could pay it back, but that he stated the schools would not close if the appropriation were withheld, I have no recollection. Of course I will not dispute what the Senator says.

But, Mr. President, to return to the scientific ideas of my friend from Maine. He proposes to send a commission off skylarking at an expense of $8,000 to watch the eclipse of the sun while he is eclipsing these young intellects right here under the Dome of the Capitol. There is too much "moonshine" in this.

I have only one word more to say on this subject, and that is to correct what I said about the amount of these deficiencies. The honorable Senator from Kentucky has taken me to task a little with reference to my criticism of this deficiency bill. I think it is true I made a mistake. I made two mistakes in fact. I said there had been seven deficiency bills appropriating some four or five millions of dollars during this Congress. There have been only six deficiency bills, but the aggregate of deficiencies at this time already passed, and including those in this bill, foot up $8,048,017.86; so that I was very far below the amount of deficiency. What I criticize is this: the deficiency bills come at us wrong end first. We ought to have had the large deficiency bill, covering everything that was really known to be necessary, and then if there was anything omitted, it could have been acted on afterward.

Mr. BECK. If the Senator from Minnesota will allow me, I desire to say that we did think we would make a saving, but it is impossible to make the Departments obey the law. Deficiencies are created by the Departments and the House of Representatives yields to their importunities and supplies the Departments with what they demand. Appropriations are made in this bill for public buildings. Those of course are not deficiencies. One of the items of which the honorable Senator now complains, running up to nearly half a million dollars, was inserted in the deficiency bill in the Senate, with his consent, with the consent of all of us, to carry on the State, War, and Navy Department building here in the city of Washington, upon the ground that we could get labor more cheaply now than we could at any other time, and that it would be for the interest of the Government to anticipate the regular appropriation bill and advance the money, just as we are anticipating and advancing $300,000 now for transportation of subsistence supplies to the Upper Missouri in order to save money. And I would say now, if this is the way the House of Representatives are to be treated, because they are seeking to carry on the Government and enable the heads of Departments to carry on their business, if I were in the House of Representatives I would stop sending any further deficiency bills here rather than to send bills here to be made the subject of groundless complaint and for the House to be insulted by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is, Will the Senate agree to the report of the committee of conference?

Mr. McMAHON. I call for the regular order.

REPEAL OF THE BANKRUPT LAW.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, it is the consideration of the unfinished business coming over from yesterday, the bill (S. No. 35) to repeal the bankrupt law.

Mr. KELLEY. Upon this matter of the regular order I desire to inquire of the Chair whether it would be in order to ask unanimous consent that the time for debate be fixed?

The SPEAKER. It has not been fixed so far.

Mr. KELLEY. I understand that it has been fixed at two hours.

The SPEAKER. Not in the House; that arrangement may have been made by some one, but not upon the floor of the House.

Mr. KELLEY. I think there should be some discussion of the bill. I find that there is an impression abroad that the debate upon the bill is to be limited to two hours and that those two hours have been apportioned between nine gentlemen. This is a grave question and I will ask for four hours' discussion upon it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that the Committee on the Judiciary have assigned to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] the charge of this bill, and therefore the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio as controlling the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Allow me to remark that this bill was not discussed at all in the Senate, except that one gentleman made a short speech. It has never been discussed in either House. We have discussed it in the Committee on the Judiciary and have come to a conclusion upon it.

Mr. McMAHON. I would ask the Chair whether if the previous question is seconded there would be one hour for debate in addition to the two hours agreed upon?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that in this instance there is no reporter of the measure.

Mr. McMAHON. I have been instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to call the previous question after two hours of debate, and without further instruction from that committee I could not change that order.

The SPEAKER. The House has its remedy: it can vote down the previous question.

Mr. SAYLER. Of course the House can vote down the previous question.

Mr. McMAHON. I give notice, then, that at the end of two hours I shall call the previous question, and would say that when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] says that the discussion is to be limited to nine members he is entirely mistaken.

Mr. KELLEY. I shall ask that the previous question be voted down and the time extended two hours.

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. I would like to ask what amendments the committee mean to entertain and in what order.

Mr. McMAHON. The committee have instructed me to offer a substitute for the bill, which I hold in my hand.

The SPEAKER. The bill will first be read.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

That the bankrupt law approved March 2, 1867, and all acts in amendment or supplementary thereto or in explanation thereof, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. HUNTON. I rise to a question of order, and it is whether it would be in order to move to refer this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. McMAHON. I do not yield the floor for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio declines to yield, but if the previous question be not sustained by the House then the motion to refer will be in order.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire, if I can have an opportunity, to move to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. McMAHON. Before presenting the substitute I yield to the chairman of the committee for the purpose of offering an amendment that will perfect the Senate bill.

Mr. KNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I presume that the judgment of every member on this floor as to the policy or impolicy of repealing the bankrupt law has already been formed, and that no argument I might offer, even if I were allowed more than five minutes, would affect that judgment. The bill is short and simple. If the bankrupt law is an evil to commerce it ought to be repealed at once; if, on the contrary, it is a beneficent measure it ought not to be repealed. But upon the hypothesis that it ought to be repealed there are grave doubts in the minds of many as to whether the bill passed by the Senate will effect that object. It will be observed by section 5596 of the Revised Statutes that—

All acts of Congress passed prior to said 1st day of December, 1873, any portion of which is embraced in any section of said revision, are hereby repealed, and the section applicable thereto shall be in force in lieu thereof; all parts of such acts not contained in such revision, having been repealed or superseded by subsequent acts, or not being general and permanent in their nature: Provided, That the incorporation into said revision of any general and permanent provision, taken from an act making appropriations, or from an act containing other provisions of a private, local, or temporary character, shall not repeal, or in any way affect any appropriation, or any provision of a private, local or temporary character, contained in any of said acts, but the same shall remain in force; and all acts of Congress passed prior to said last-named day no part of which are embraced in said revision, shall not be affected or changed by its enactment.

The original bankrupt law of 1867 was repealed by the provision which I have just read. Singularly enough, however, the act of June 22, 1874, was passed after the adoption of the Revised Statutes, entitled "An act to amend an act establishing a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, and for other purposes, approved June 22, 1877," without referring to the Revised Statutes at all, so that it is thought by some that the original act having been repealed the act supplementary to and explanatory thereof has not been repealed.

Now, whether that be correct or not, in order that all doubts upon that score may be set at rest, I propose to amend the bill of the Senate by inserting after the words "that the bankrupt law approved March 2, 1867," the words "and title 61 of Revised Statutes, and an act entitled 'An act to amend and supplement the act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, approved March 2, 1867,' and for other purposes,' approved June 22, 1874." That will remove all doubt as to whether the bill reported from the Senate will accomplish the object for which it was intended.

In my judgment, there is another defect in this bill. It makes no provision for the prosecution of any penal action or criminal prosecution that may have arisen out of any violation of the provisions of the bankrupt law. If the bankrupt law shall be repealed before a criminal prosecution shall be instituted for any violation of its provisions, of course upon very obvious and familiar principles no such prosecution can be maintained. I therefore move to further amend the Senate bill by inserting after the words "future proceedings therein," in line 10 of the amended bill, the words "and all penal actions or criminal prosecutions arising thereunder."

Mr. McMAHON. I now, by instructions of the Committee on the Judiciary, move as a substitute for the entire Senate bill that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

SECTION 1. That title 61 of the Revised Statutes, regulating proceedings in bankruptcy, and all laws amendatory of or supplemental to the same, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. This act shall not affect pending suits, prosecutions, proceedings, or applications, nor subsequent petitions for discharge thereon, nor any right of action accruing therein to assignees or others.

SEC. 3. This act shall take effect from its passage as to all involuntary proceedings, except as provided in the preceding sections, and as to voluntary applications from and after the 1st day of January, 1879.

SEC. 4. All petitions filed by an insolvent debtor before the said 1st day of January, 1879, under the law regulating proceedings in cases of voluntary bankruptcy, shall be acted upon and proceeded in to final settlement, adjudication, distribution, and discharge under said title and the laws supplemental thereto or amendatory thereof, as though this act had not been passed.

Mr. CRAVENS. Are any other amendments in order at this time?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] has control of the first hour of the consideration of this bill. After the time of the gentleman shall have expired, then other amendments under the rules will be in order.

Mr. McMAHON. I cannot yield at present for any further amendments. It is important for the House to understand what is the situation of this controversy. I desire to say now that when I made the statement awhile ago that I was not authorized to extend the time for debate upon this bill, I did so merely under instructions of the Committee on the Judiciary. So far as I am myself concerned, I shall not only be willing but rather desirous that the time for debate shall be extended, so that so important a subject as this shall not be disposed of without some understanding of what is proposed to be done.

There are three conflicting views in regard to a bankrupt law. One class of persons desire a permanent bankrupt law, and want the present law amended. All admit its errors and incompleteness. There is another class who favor unconditional and immediate repeal of the law. Then there is a third class, represented by the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary of this House, who want the law repealed, but in view of the present condition of the country and the steady decline in values they want the repeal as to voluntary proceedings in bankruptcy to take effect on the first day of January next, and not before.

I understand the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. KNOTT] to represent those who are in favor of the immediate and unconditional repeal, saving of course penal as well as civil suits and proceedings. I understand that there are other gentlemen on this floor who are in favor of a permanent bankrupt law, believing that the present law can be so amended as to answer all the wants of the people throughout the United States.

I speak here on behalf of those who believe that a bankrupt law as a permanent institution in this country is to a certain extent contrary to the spirit of our institutions, and in times past has proved a failure. We want to modify the repeal proposed by the Senate bill so as to give a limited time in which persons at present involved, or who may be hereafter oppressed by the business condition of the country, may apply and receive the benefit of the law.

In whatever shape we may pass any bill to-day, it must go back to the Senate. Should the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky be adopted, which is more than verbal in its character, the bill must be returned to the Senate for concurrence? Should the substitute be adopted, which I have moved by instruction of the committee, of course the bill must be sent back to the Senate for concurrence.

I propose to speak now for a few moments upon the views entertained in part by those I represent. In my judgment a bankrupt law is a law peculiarly adapted to a commercial country. It is not adapted in my judgment to a country like this, where the great mass of our people are farmers, and where even a large portion of the persons who are engaged in commercial pursuits have never been educated up to the high idea of commercial promptness that exists in the cities of New York and Boston, and notably in the cities of Great Britain.

A bankrupt law has therefore always been against the sentiment of the people of the West and against the sentiment of a great portion of the people of the South as a permanent institution. And this sentiment has found expression in this branch of the Government by decided and overwhelming votes for unconditional repeal.

In the second place the bankrupt law has proved a failure in practice. I defy any gentleman upon either side of the House to dispute that fact. It is a failure in the distribution of the assets of the insolvent. I think I can say safely and challenge contradiction that the average percentage which is paid in the distribution of an insolvent's estate does not exceed, and has not for many years exceeded, 10 or 15 per cent. The great mass of the mercantile world feel that when a case has gone into bankruptcy they might as well give up their claims or sell them; their interest in the future of the bankrupt, both as to his person and his estate, is practically extinguished.

This is a very important and a very serious objection. It does not grow out of the costs and expenses of insolvency alone, although these in a great measure contribute to it, but it grows out of the very system itself. It grows out of the fact that by the existing law you prevent the ordinary attachment laws of the State from operating; you prevent levies and executions from being made; you prevent suits from being instituted. In other words, you prevent the debtor from being called to account except by proceedings in involuntary bankruptcy, which are so hampered as to be of little value to the creditor.

This being the case, the insolvent debtor is enabled to live out of the estate up to the very last moment; and he does live out of it until finally there is nothing left but the shell. He then goes into bankruptcy, or is thrown into bankruptcy; and when his assets come to be divided there is only enough left to pay the assignee, the clerk, the marshal, the register, and above all—last but not least—that ubiquitous gentleman, the lawyer.

This is one of the reasons why the law has been a failure. There is another reason why it has failed, and why it should not be a permanent system. The moment the assignee is appointed it becomes his duty to ascertain whether there has been any fraudulent sale or illegal preference within the period of time fixed by the statute. He is then compelled to institute suits wherever he may find a creditor who has had a preference—in the city of New York, in Boston, or elsewhere; and if anything is to be done, the assignee may have two, three, four, or perhaps a dozen suits pending in different circuit courts of the United States, or at home, employing as many different lawyers, so that by the time he is ready to settle up the estate, if that happy time ever does come, there is nothing left practically for the creditor. All this litigation is to be conducted in remote courts—the courts of the United States. Suitors, witnesses, and all are to be dragged hundreds of miles away in many instances.

Therefore, for my part, I want to see the bankrupt law destroyed as a permanent act. But I do not wish to see it repealed to take effect to-morrow or next week or the 1st day of next July. To permit the repeal to take effect anywhere near the present time is substantially to shut off a large number of persons who may be compelled to seek its benefits within a very short period of time. In our past history and experience we have passed bankrupt laws after great periods of business depression, after great commercial crises, for the purpose of enabling the thrifty who have been unfortunate to get on their feet again so that society may not be deprived of the energy and ability of enterprising but unfortunate citizens. If this law which has been upon our statute-books for eleven years be now repealed, at the very time when we are entering upon a period of increased business depression, when we are constantly witnessing further decline in values, we are reversing our policy. My judgment is that we ought to give at least six months or a year—the Committee on the Judiciary says until the 1st day of next January, I would say March or July following—in order that this country may realize, before the voluntary feature is repealed, the full extent of the depression in business and decline in values and everything else which will be experienced. I think that this much is due to the commercial and manufacturing classes of the country, because it is by the legislation of Congress that this condition of affairs has been in part brought about. It is not alone by the mismanagement or misfortune of the merchant or manufacturer; it is not certainly by his misconduct in many instances. Whatever view gentlemen may entertain upon the question of the resumption act, I think no man will dispute the proposition that whether the resumption act be right or wrong, when resumption actually takes place, not simply equalization of paper and coin but resumption, when practically you will be reduced to that amount of currency which can be floated upon a specie basis, I say every man, whatever his views may be, must admit that when that comes there will be a much larger depreciation in values; and many men who are now engaged in prosperous commercial and manufacturing enterprises will then be compelled to seek the benefit of this act. I submit, therefore, that it would be exceedingly unfortunate and inopportune for us to make the repeal to take effect immediately. As against immediate repeal I will vote for any proposition limiting the repeal to take effect on or after January 1, 1879.

I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, the repeal of the bankrupt law is probably a foregone conclusion in this Congress. The absolute repeal so far as the other branch of Congress is concerned has already taken place. After the passage of the repealing act by the Senate the first action of the Judiciary Committee of this House was a vote of the committee recommending to this House concurrence in the Senate's action for the immediate and full repeal of the bankrupt law. During the period that has intervened between that action of the committee and the present time members have learned from the press or from letters and telegrams coming from their constituents that all over the country men are desirous of knowing the exact time when this repeal is to take effect, in order that they may have opportunity before that time to file their petitions for voluntary bankruptcy.

Any one who looks at the newspapers of our principal cities will learn that within the last few days there has been one continuous rush into the courts for voluntary bankruptcy as well as many cases of involuntary bankruptcy. I think—indeed I know—the views of some members of the Judiciary Committee were changed on this subject by what is passing in the country before their eyes and within their own knowledge, so much so that the committee concluded to reconsider its action and to recommend to this House the adoption of the substitute which has been reported by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] recommending to the House to pass the act for repeal to take effect immediately as to involuntary bankruptcy upon the passage of the law, but postponing its action as to voluntary bankruptcy until the 1st of January next. That amendment meets my view of what is demanded by the circumstances by which we are surrounded; and although I should be in favor, unless this amendment can be adopted, of the repeal of the bankrupt law, yet I do think the condition of the country, the circumstances of the people, the uncertainty of our legislation, the threatening danger connected with legislation in regard to financial acts, especially the great and imminent and as I believe the overwhelming danger of ruin and injury to the country arising from what may be the action of Congress under the leadership of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] in disarranging the whole tariff of the country and destroying root and branch the interests of the country, agricultural, mechanical, manufacturing, and every interest around which the labor of the American people to-day gathers—I say these threatening and impending efforts of that class of enthusiasts who may be summed up in the character of communist, free-trader, inflationist, and representatives of all those political isms which threaten destruction to all the general interests and stability of the country would invite members of this body, whatever their desire or determination may have been, to pause a moment before they forced into voluntary or involuntary bankruptcy many of the citizens of the country who have been for years struggling as they have never struggled before to sustain their credit, to pay their debts, to preserve something for their families in the hope that they may tide over the difficulty, but who see in the passage of this act their only possible chance to free themselves from life-long slavery to their creditors depends on the extension of time for voluntary bankruptcy.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. CONGER. When my ten minutes are up I will yield for five minutes out of my time or anybody else's time to the gentleman from New Hampshire. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, there are gentlemen in this House who have shown to me within the last few days letters from their constituents saying they have worked night and day hoping to maintain their honor, hoping to preserve their credit, hoping to pay off their indebtedness, hoping to save a pittance out of the property which they once considered abundant for all debts and abundant for all necessities of their old age—saying that if this bill passes they desire to know the day and the hour and the minute when it takes effect, because they cannot struggle longer unless there be some opportunity hereafter offered for relief from all their labors and troubles if their best endeavors shall fail, and saying they wish to know the hour of its passage so they may not fail to take advantage of the bankrupt law before its repeal takes effect.

There is but one single proposition upon which the members of the committee differ. All of them are agreed that the bankrupt law will be repealed; that in the natural order of things it must be repealed. There is a majority of that committee, and I hope it will prove true that there is a majority of this House, in favor of extending to the 1st of January next the effect of this bill repealing the bankrupt law so far as voluntary bankruptcy is concerned.

Mr. Speaker, if we were living in a time when the future in the next few months could be foreseen with the same certainty it may be in ordinary times we might perhaps be justified in acting differently, but we have, as I have believed, arrived only at the beginning of the troubles of our finances and of our labor question in this country. Whatever may be the result, how soon hereafter it may be when this country will regain the lost road to prosperity, we must go through first the valley of uncertainty, of doubt, of greatly increased lack of confidence in the public mind beyond what we have already passed through, if that be possible. And I submit whether, as the guardians of the interests of the whole people, we should not provide that at least we shall not increase this doubt, this lack of confidence, this voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy, which, sir, from the action of this House to-day until this bill be signed by the President of the United States, if there be not this extension of time to the 1st of January next, will crowd our courts with rushing multitudes of men to take advantage of the bankrupt law proposed to be repealed before the last chance of escape from the life-long and hopeless servitude which unliquidated indebtedness has fastened upon them. Give youth and strength and energy one chance of escape. Give to our common humanity one chance, when the better times we hope for shall come, to enter again in the race for life, with the prospect of some usefulness and some prosperity in their future life.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. McMAHON. I yield five minutes to my colleague on the Judiciary Committee, the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.]

Mr. FRYE. Five minutes to discuss a great question like the repeal of the bankrupt act is simply an absurdity, and I shall not undertake to do it.

I differ from the majority of the Judiciary Committee wholly. In my opinion not only is it the constitutional right, but, further, it is the constitutional duty of the Congress of the United States to enact and keep upon the statute-book a bankrupt law. I hold that it is an absolute necessity to the commercial law of this land. That commercial law without it is as a man without an arm or without a leg.

But, sir, my views in the present condition of things, even if I had time to discuss them at length, would have no weight at all in this House. Why, sir, the Judiciary Committee of the Forty-third Congress spent two solid months of time in endeavoring to perfect this bankrupt law and remove from it its objectionable features; and yet when it came into this House, with that labor expended upon it, like a whirlwind, in a minute, the bankrupt law was absolutely repealed, and only the Senate of the United States saved it. And again, when the Judiciary Committee spent time and labor and brains in perfecting this bill and it came into the House there was, as with a whirlwind, swept through this House and sent to the Senate a repeal of the bankrupt law. In Heaven's name what encouragement has ever been given to a committee of this House to take this law and provide remedies where they do not exist, to correct imperfections, and to make a law which should stand through all time as a part of the commercial law of this country?

In this present Congress the Judiciary Committee of the House, relying upon the action of the Senate in the past, determined to amend, and while considering, heard from the Senate that the Judiciary Committee of that body had not recommended but would permit a repeal of the law; and knowing the temper of the House the committee stopped all further consideration of this bill and reported, because consideration was futile, because it was throwing away time, utterly throwing it away, they reported concurrence with the Senate or else this substitute.

Sir, I believe the action of Congress to be all wrong, radically wrong. I believe the bankrupt law can be perfected. The men who have killed the law are the officers who have had its enforcement in their hands. The complaints against the law have been for exorbitant and exacting fees on the part of these officers, and when this law dies to-day in the Congress of the United States the very men who should have been its friends, the men who selfishly should have been its friends, may lay the unction to their souls that they by their avarice, that they by their greed have killed the bird that was laying for them, day by day, the golden egg. The law dies not because the law was in fault; the law dies because the officers enforcing the law were selfish and avaricious.

Sir, believing as I do that a bankrupt law should be a part of the commercial law of the country, but knowing that my views will not carry perhaps a score of voters in this House, I joined with the majority of the Judiciary Committee and recommend the substitute of the House bill for the Senate bill.

Mr. McMAHON. I yield fifteen minutes to my colleague on the Judiciary Committee, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. LAPHAM.]

Mr. LAPHAM. Mr. Speaker, it is provided in the Constitution of the United States that Congress shall have power to enact uniform laws regulating bankruptcy throughout the United States. And yet, as bearing upon this discussion, it is a most important historical fact that this power has been rarely exercised by Congress.

The first bankrupt law, Mr. Speaker, was passed on the 3d of April, in the year 1800. That law remained in force until the 19th of December, 1803, a period of a little over three years and a half. There was no other enactment of a bankrupt law until the 19th of August, 1841, and that law was repealed on the 3d of March, 1843; so that that law, enacted after the terrible commercial disasters of 1837, remained in force less than two years.

The present law, Mr. Speaker, was enacted on the 2d of March, 1867, and with its modifications has remained in force until the present time. It has so remained in force in view of the great disasters to business men, which grew out of the terrible conflict of arms in the recent rebellion. But in my judgment the time has now arrived when this law, as was the case with its predecessor, should be blotted from the face of the statute-book.

Mr. Speaker, I answer the eloquent gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] by pointing to this practice of a hundred years of our history by the statesmen of all periods as an argument against the continuance of a permanent national system of bankruptcy. This House on two, if not three, occasions has passed a bill for the unlimited repeal of this law; but the Senate up to the present Congress has failed to act upon the subject. The Senate has now taken the initiative and has sent to us a bill for the unconditional repeal of the law; and, with the amendment proposed by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. KNOTT] incorporating the sections of the Revised Statutes on the subject, the repeal will be complete.

Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this repeal. The only object of a bankrupt law is an equal distribution of the property of those who are embarrassed at the time of its passage, an equal distribution of their property among all their creditors and the release of the debtor from his obligations. It never was designed that a bankrupt law should remain a permanent system, in view of which men may calculate their chances, intending, when the time comes, to avail themselves of its provisions. That division of property among those who were embarrassed at the time the law was passed in 1867 having become an accomplished fact, what occasion is there for a continuance of this law? Is there any other than to leave the door open for that system of frauds which are being perpetrated under it and which are as patent to the public gaze as the sun at noon-day? Postpone this repeal until the 1st of July next or until the 1st of January next, and more frauds will be perpetrated than have been perpetrated within the eleven years during which it has been enforced. What is the law to-day but a menace to creditors and an invitation to people to engage in reckless business speculations and to avail themselves of this law for their relief? And as to the involuntary provision, it is a menace to business men by which their creditors hold them in their grasp and may at any time destroy their business. Sir, we have come down, if I may use a common phrase, to "hard pan." There is a returning prosperity from one end of the country to the other. The difference between bank paper and specie is less than it ever has been since the war, and there never was a time when bank paper was so near to specie as it is now. We have arrived at a time when there is no occasion for the continuance of such a law.

Now, under the operation of this law it is a notorious fact that not a tithe of the debtor's property reaches his creditors. Careful estimates show that the average of the debtor's property that reaches the creditor is not 10 per cent. under the bankrupt law, while the average dividend under the insolvent laws of the States runs as high as 35 per cent. Then there is the delay. The great mass of the debtor's property under this law is by delay used up by the officials who have control of the operation of the law, and the result is that with a mere tithe of the debtor's property given to his creditors the debtor himself, after he obtains his discharge, turns up with a wife, a brother, or a friend, with a competency on which he can rely for the remainder of his life.

The frauds perpetrated at the present time in the administration of this law are enormous as is known by every observing citizen. I am therefore in favor of the adoption of the Senate bill, with the amendments proposed by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, including the section of Revised Statutes which makes the repeal effective.

I do not know that it is necessary for me to dwell longer on this subject. It is a subject which cannot be discussed thoroughly or elaborately in the brief space of time given to me; but it seems to me that the usage of the statesmen of the country under the Constitution for nearly a hundred years since its adoption and the known evils that grow out of the administration of the law at present call loudly upon this House, which has twice or thrice decided in favor of an unconditional repeal of the law, to repeal it now by adopting the Senate bill as amended.

Mr. McMAHON. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN.]

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Mr. Speaker, I listened to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] with admiration and with astonishment. I believe with him that a bankrupt law, a good bankrupt law, is an absolute necessity for our country. I believe that this substitute for the Senate bill is the most dangerous proposition of legislation that has been presented to the Forty-fifth Congress, and I do not say one careless or loose word in that assertion. I believe that if it should be adopted the whole country will deprecate and deplore it.

There is not a lawyer upon this floor, there is not an intelligent merchant in the whole country, who has watched the proceedings under the bankrupt law of the last four years, who can have failed to observe that few if any have been injured by the involuntary feature of the law, and here comes a proposition to repeal that and to allow the voluntary feature to extend until the 1st of January next. What is it that is involved in that proposition? It is nothing less than an invitation to a high carnival of disaster, default, and fraud.

Sir, in view of these facts, which are incontrovertible and notoriously so, it is proposed to repeal the involuntary feature of the present law immediately, allowing the other to remain in force for eight full months. I, for one, protest against it.

Under this bankrupt law fraud has become, if I may use the expression, an exact science. There is not a man familiar with its operation who does not know that it is perfectly easy for any dishonest man—I do not charge now that it has been done—but I say that any man can divide his property among his friends, reserving enough only to pay the officials who administer this law.

That is the invitation which this Congress proposes to give to the five hundred thousand, more or less, merchants and people in this country who have been involved in the ruin of war, inflation, and speculation during the last twenty years; that is the invitation which this Congress proposes to give to everybody for eight months longer. If there is any man on this floor who can justify that, if there is any man who can show that under the administration of the bankrupt law the average creditor ever gets justice or anything worth having, if there is any man on this floor who can disprove my statement that in nine cases out of ten not 1 per cent. is ever paid to the merchants of New York and Boston by their debtors who have gone into bankruptcy, then I will yield. I say 1 per cent., not 10 per cent., as was said by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] who opened this debate.

Now, in the name of reason, after all the wild and fanatical bills offered in this Congress, I ask if we shall heap upon our reputation for common sense eternal contempt by inviting every man who feels that the resumption act, the war of the rebellion, has ruined him to go into bankruptcy and defraud his creditors of every cent that he owes them, with eight months for consideration.

I rose to my feet, Mr. Speaker, laboring under a physical weakness which I feared would bring me to my chair in less than a minute. I did not expect to do more than to set thinking some of the strong men of this House on this subject. I have stated facts in regard to the operation of this law which no man can deny. I say that this proposed substitute is the most dangerous proposition that has been before Congress, the most dangerous proposition that we can possibly adopt. It will lead to results which no man can foresee in respect to the record of bankruptcies of this country. I voted for the repeal of the bankrupt law in the whirlwind of feeling to which reference has been made by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.] I voted for it under the very deliberate instructions which I had then received experimentally in regard to the operation of the law. I desire to vote again for the repeal of the existing law because it cannot be amended and also because we can never get a good law until this is out of the way; but I beg the House to refuse to repeal the law by means of the proposed substitute. If we do it it will certainly come back upon us to confound us.

Human nature ever remains the same. In the demoralized condition of our country human nature cannot resist such an opportunity. I read in the papers of yesterday that in three or four of the large cities of this country some thirty applications had been made in one or two days to take the benefit of the bankrupt law. Pass this substitute, and before next January there will be ten thousand who will apply for the benefit of the bankrupt law. I do not mean to use an exaggerated expression; I believe my statement to be true to the letter.

Mr. LAPHAM. I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. EWING.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] has not expired.

Mr. McMAHON. How much is left?

The SPEAKER. Four minutes.

Mr. LAPHAM. Then I will wait until those four minutes have been disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] gave notice that at the end of two hours he proposed to call the previous question. The Chair does not think that the gentleman from Ohio can claim under the rules the control of more than one hour. At the end of his hour, unless the previous question shall be called and sustained, the bill will be open to disposal under the rules of the House, open to amendment, and the Chair thinks also open to the motion of which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] gave notice, to commit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HANNA. Would it be proper to move to extend the time for one hour longer?

The SPEAKER. No limit has yet been fixed for debate.

Mr. McMAHON. All the bills for the repeal or the amendment of the bankrupt law have been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; and it is a question peculiarly proper for the Judiciary Committee. A subcommittee of that committee was considering all those different bills when the Senate passed the bill now before the House. We then took action as a committee, and I was authorized to appear in the House as the organ of the committee, and the Chair recognized me for that purpose. I do not know who would have control of this bill, if anybody has.

The SPEAKER. The House has control of the bill.

Mr. McMAHON. I have no objection to that whatever, but it seems to me that the persons to be recognized are those who have given the matter consideration, the members of the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there may be a great many members of the House not members of the Committee on the Judiciary who have given consideration to this subject.

Mr. McMAHON. The Chair must not understand that I desire to exclude other persons. On the contrary, I stated at the outset that I would myself vote against the previous question in order to extend the time for discussion.

Mr. HANNA. Then at the proper time—

The SPEAKER. The intimation was certainly made that at the end of two hours an effort would be made to close debate.

Mr. HANNA. I trust that will not be done.

The SPEAKER. The House can determine for itself when that question is presented. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] to submit the motion of which he gave notice some time since.

Mr. HUNTON. I move to commit the bill with the pending amendments to the Committee on the Judiciary. That motion I believe is debatable, and I desire to say a few words upon it.

I agree with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] that if the bankrupt law is an unmitigated evil it ought to be repealed out and out. I am not one of those who believe it to be an unmitigated evil. I am one of that class referred to by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] who believe that the country requires at the hands of the Congress of the United States a permanent, well-considered, well-digested bankrupt law.

I am unalterably opposed to many of the features of the existing bankrupt law; but I believe there is wisdom enough in this House, wisdom enough in the Judiciary Committee of the House, to frame a bankrupt law which will be free from the objections applicable to the existing law, and which will be such a measure as the commercial necessities of this country demand.

It appears to me singular that now, at the period of the greatest commercial distress that this country has known since the termination of the war, the bankrupt law, designed to relieve the necessities of the people, should be repealed out and out. I, for one, am not willing in the present condition of circumstances to vote for an unconditional or a conditional repeal. I desire to exhaust every effort on the part of this House through its proper committee to mature and perfect the bankrupt law, to rid it of its evils and make it what it was designed to be, a blessing to the country. I think this country has reached such a stage of commercial progress as to require a permanent system of bankruptcy; and I believe that if a law free from the objectionable features of the present act were framed it would be acceptable to the whole country and would be beneficent in its operation. I therefore move that this bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

I yield to my friend from Ohio [Mr. EWING] thirty minutes of my time.

Mr. EWING. I hope the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] will prevail. I regard this bill to repeal the bankrupt law as one of the most important measures we have had before us for consideration. It has not yet been debated, and the evident purpose of an overwhelming majority to pass it plainly indicates that debate is useless. Yet I cannot sit silent and see it pass without at least my protest.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, is a fit sequence of the resumption law, to complete the work of ruin it initiated. That law enacted, in effect, that all men who were so unfortunate as to have been much in debt during the past three years, and all who were so venturesome as to continue in business relying at all on credit, should be broken up, and their property taken from them and given to their creditors. This bill supplements resumption by enacting that after the creditor shall have taken the debtor's property at less than half its nominal value he shall have a mortgage on his brain and muscle for the unpaid balance of the debt.

What is the condition of the mass of the business men of this country to-day? A condition of insolvency. Probably not one man in five, taking all classes of business men together, could at once settle his debts by selling his property. And what is the cause of this condition of general insolvency? Is it the fault of the debtors? Is it because they have been extravagant or reckless? Not at all. The cause is to be found in the legislation of Congress. I care not whether it be attributed to inflation or contraction or to the combined effect of inflation followed by contraction; still the cause of the unhappy condition of the most of the business men of this country lies in the finance measures of the General Government. Now if one-half of the property of the debtor classes had been swept from them by visitation of God, or by act of war, would we, on the instant of that sad and terrible event, repeal the merciful provisions of the bankrupt law? Would we say that that was the proper time to enact that he should not be acquitted of the remainder of the debt on surrendering all he had left of his property? No; we would say it was the worst of all times to repeal the law. We would say that if ever a people needed a bankrupt law that was the time. This, Mr. Speaker, is our situation to-day. The business men of this country who are in embarrassment and practical insolvency have not brought it on themselves. Very few of them have known even the cause of the great and constant fall in price of everything in which they deal, which fall has made enterprise in almost all kinds of business pernicious and ruinous.

Mr. COLE. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EWING] assert that the business men of this country are demanding that the bankrupt law shall still exist?

Mr. EWING. No, sir; I do not say that. They have given little expression on the subject. Interested men in certain business communities have sought expressions from the business men—

Mr. COLE. I would like to ask the gentleman another question. Does he assert that not one in five of the business men of this country to-day can pay his debts?

Mr. EWING. Yes, sir. I did assert that not one-fifth of the business men of the country, taking all classes of business together, could sell their property to-day for enough money to pay their debts.

Mr. COLE. Where do you get that kind of statistics from?

Mr. EWING. From the fact that there has been in the past three years a fall in the values generally to the extent on an average of not less than 50 per cent.

Mr. COLE. And still do you assert that not one in five of the business men of the country is daily discharging his obligations?

Mr. EWING. Not at all. On the contrary, a large part of them are discharging their obligations; and this is largely due to the fact that they are sustained from being actually swept out of business by this bankrupt law. Gentlemen talk about expressions on this subject from the business men of the country. Why, sir, when a petition is carried round by men interested in the repeal of the bankrupt law, every business man signs it. The men who are strong sign it because they are of the creditor class, and want the swiftest and promptest remedy against their debtors.

Mr. COLE. I should like to ask the gentleman from Ohio another question.

Mr. EWING. My friend will please allow me to continue.

The business men who are strong sign it, for they want to get rid of this bankrupt law, which is in practical effect a stay law, so that they may be the first to seize and secure the property of the debtors. And on the other hand the embarrassed business men sign it. Why? Because to refuse to sign is to bring upon them the suspicion of insolvency. And therefore you get both sides to sign a petition wherever it is handed round by an interested man. As to the mass of the men who have been already broken up, their opinions of course are of no account. They are fallen, and are treated by their business associates as the stricken deer in Shakspeare's play of As You Like It. It was treated by his fellows of the herd as they galloped by:

Sweep on, you fat and greasy citizens;
'Tis just the fashion: Wherefore do you look Upon that poor and broken bankrupt there?

They tell us, Mr. Speaker, that the bankrupt law is only an inducement to rascality. But the tables of commercial failures for the first four or five years after its enactment show no increase of insolvency. From 1867 to 1871 bankrupts did not multiply.

Mr. CLAFLIN. I should like to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question.

Mr. EWING. Very well.

Mr. CLAFLIN. I should like to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether this law now existing was the law then in force?

Mr. EWING. It has been modified somewhat.

Mr. CLAFLIN. Has it not been modified essentially and have not all the objectional features of the bankrupt law been inserted in the last amendment?

Mr. EWING. What is the date of the last amendment?

Mr. CLAFLIN. Two or three years ago Congress passed amendments to the law which opened the door to all these frauds.

Mr. EWING. It was amended at various dates down to 1873, as the working of the law demonstrated the expediency of amendments.

Mr. CLAFLIN. That is one law and this is another.

Mr. EWING. But the whole history of the operation of the law shows that gentlemen are now saddling on it evils which did not come from it at all, but from the general fall of values consequent on the contraction involved in the resumption scheme. Bankruptcies commenced increasing from the day the resumption law passed, and have gone on increasing, considered relatively to the value of business, every month since. And to attribute these failures to the bankrupt law is unreasonable and unjust.

Now, as to these bankrupts not paying much—

Mr. BRIDGES. The gentleman has stated the commercial interests of the country require the existence of a bankrupt law. I beg leave to ask him whether the farming interests of the country require the existence of a bankrupt law—the farming interests, which constitute by far the greater majority of the people of the country?

Mr. EWING. They are comparatively little affected by the bankrupt law one way or the other.

Gentlemen say the creditors get little in bankruptcy cases. Very true. Why? From two causes, one of which we can remedy—indeed, both of which are within our power to remedy. First, the enormous costliness of the machinery by which the law is executed. Second, the steady and continuous fall of values arising from preparation for forced resumption. The creditors get little because since the resumption law passed men have been going on in business, growing more cautious it is true, but still going on, in the hope constantly of better times. Every opening season in New York has been hailed with false assurances that business was reviving, leading embarrassed men to struggle on, though falling behind each year and consuming their past accumulations, in the hope of better times. And when at last they sink into bankruptcy their remaining property has shrunk to a half or a third of its former value by the general fall of prices resulting from this attempt at forced resumption, so that when the lawyers, and marshals, and assignees have made their charges there is unfortunately little left for the creditor.

I notice that in speaking of this subject some of the newspapers tell us to "remit the matter to the States." But the difficulty is that a State has no power to pass an efficient bankrupt law. If we repeal this act and the States enact bankrupt or insolvent laws they can have no application to debts or contracts already existing, because of the inhibition in the Federal Constitution against State laws impairing the obligation of contracts. Moreover, the State bankrupt or insolvent laws cannot discharge the debtor from debts contracted outside of the State. Therefore, practically, so far as this relief is concerned, it rests solely with the General Government to grant it.

Mr. Speaker, I think the repeal of this law now is bad legislation considered broadly as a question of general policy. Its inhumanity alone makes it bad statesmanship. In the name of God, have not the struggling mass of business men in this country suffered enough? Is there not enough of angry discontent to-day? Is not the feeling of wrong inflicted by law sufficiently general and intense? Shall we aggravate it by telling these embarrassed men that hereafter when they break down under the oppression of our own enactments—

Mr. COLE. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. EWING. I prefer not to be interrupted just now. Shall we aggravate it by telling them that hereafter when they shall break down—not through their fault, not through their recklessness, not through causes that they could control or even understand, but solely through mischievous legislation—that when they fall, they shall "fall like Lucifer, never to hope again?" Beware, Mr. Speaker, of adding anything more to the discontent which now pervades all classes of our people—business men, wage men, and the millions restively suffering in idleness because there is no work to do—beware of adding fuel to that fire already prepared for kindling which may sweep over our land beyond the power of Government to stay or extinguish it.

The repeal of this law is bad policy also because it consigns to business death a large part of a generation of business men as intelligent, as honest, as buoyant and spirited as was ever crushed by the greed of avarice or the blundering of heedless legislation. The country loses their services. They go out. For how can a man stripped of his property rise with a millstone of debt about his neck? You make the world a dungeon for him, and you chain him to the door. Shylock said:

You take my life,
When you do take the means whereby I live.

But the proud and ambitious man, in youth or middle life, would greatly rather lose his property than have a burden of debt upon him which makes it impossible that he shall ever again have enterprise or hope of honest accumulation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HUNTON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. HOOKER.]

Mr. HOOKER. If we would listen to the argument which has just been made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EWING] we would conclude that the functions and office of a bankrupt law were to relieve the debtor by making him incapable of paying his debts. I have thought that the functions and office of a bankrupt law were to take the property of the debtor honestly surrendering it and distribute it among his creditors. That is all that it proposes to do and that is all the operation of the law.

I am opposed to the proposition of my friend from Virginia to refer this question back to the committee, and I am opposed to it because I believe that this House is prepared to pass upon this question. Twice has the House of Representatives by an overwhelming vote swept from the statute-book this nefarious act which, instead of being a protection to labor and to industry and the support of the business men of the country, has paralyzed that labor and that industry, and prostrated the great material resources of the country. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EWING] referred to the agricultural interest, that great interest which lies at the foundation of all others, that without the sustenance and support of which all others would fail and crumble to the earth; that great interest without which your vast commerce would perish and your magnificent docks from New York to Galveston would rot to the water's edge and your vessels, when you are reduced to a fifth-rate power, would be eaten up by the barnacles of the sea.

I say, sir, that the great agricultural interests of the country have been more injured and damaged by the bankrupt law than any other interest in the country, although it has been a protection to commercial men.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] offers a substitute for the Senate bill by which he proposes to revive the most nefarious feature of the act of 1870, the voluntary feature of the bill under which a man could go into bankruptcy and leave nothing to his creditors, his assets being taken by the assignee in bankruptcy and the officers under the bankrupt law.

I appeal to the House not to vote for the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] to refer this matter to the Committee on the Judiciary, but to accept the bill as it comes from the Senate. I know that one feature of the law is an engine of oppression against the debtor class, and that is the voluntary feature. The creditor, the reckless creditor, the heartless creditor, when forced into bankruptcy may defraud his creditors under this provision of the law. I have seen since the modification of the law many of the operations of it and the injury inflicted by the voluntary feature of the law which it is proposed to leave in operation.

The gentleman from Ohio proposes to continue practically the voluntary and the involuntary portions of the law. I am aware, as has been said, that it is a serious thing to be in debt, and that, in the language of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. McMAHON,] it is like being in a dungeon; I am aware of that.

A friend of mine once said: "I am under an iceberg of debt overdue and its glittering dew-drops have dripped day by day upon my head." But I am not aware that the debtor class of the community will confer any benefit by keeping the involuntary part of the law in operation; on the contrary you put the sword of Damocles into the hand of the creditor to oppress the debtor, and I know no class of the community in which it has been wielded with such oppression and prostration of industry as against the great farming interests of the country, upon which everything else depends. I hope the House will vote down the motion to refer the bill. I desire to add only that the Legislature of the State of Mississippi has unanimously passed a resolution requesting its Representatives to vote for this bill.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. HALE. I rise to a question of privilege. I desire to present a report from a committee of conference and it is important that it should be agreed to to-day and sent to the Senate.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3740) to provide for deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for prior years, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendments numbered 15, 16, 18, 19, 25, 28, 30, 31, and 37.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 13, 14, 17, 20, 23, 24, 26, 27, 32, 33, 34, 35, and 36, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 12, and agree to the same, with amendment as follows: Strike out of said amendment the words "and binding," and strike out "forty" and insert in lieu thereof "thirty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 21, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "fifteen," and substitute therefor the word "twelve;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 22, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out the words "two thousand" and insert in lieu thereof "fifteen hundred;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 29, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Amend the title of the bill by inserting after the word "years," in said title, the words "for subsistence of the Army;" and the Senate agree to the same.

EUGENE HALE,
JAMES H. BLOUNT,
Managers on the part of the House.
J. G. BLAINE,
JAMES B. BECK,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I move that the report of the committee of conference be agreed to.

The question was taken; and the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPEAL OF THE BANKRUPT ACT.

Mr. HUNTON. I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

Mr. KELLEY. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to indorse what was so well said by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] as to the necessity of a bankrupt law as a part of the laws of every commercial nation. It is necessary and vital to such a body of laws. I desire also to invoke in favor of the proposition to send this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary what was said by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAPHAM] touching the history of such laws in our past. Such a law, he said, has ever been passed to relieve the victims of a commercial crisis, after which they were repealed; and, he added, that having done that this law had done its work. I say, sir, that the American people have never been in so grand a commercial and manufacturing crisis as they now are. They were never suffering under a more portentous one than that which now overwhelms them. The gentleman said that we had reached a period when our paper money is nearer to gold than bank-notes ever were, and when he said that he told the truth, for the greenback or national-bank note will travel without discount through every State in the Union, and there never was a time under our old money system when bank-notes would travel a hundred miles from the State that had incorporated the bank that issues them without discount. But that fact does not attest the prosperity of the people. Look at Massachusetts with $250,000,000 of deposits in savings-banks!

Mr. BUTLER. Two hundred and forty millions.

Mr. KELLEY. Well, $240,000,000; that is a good round sum. I have been told by other gentlemen from that State that it is $252,000,000. Be it either $252,000,000 or $240,000,000, it is held subject to a conditional stay law, enacted recently and precipitately, which provides that the directors of every savings-bank may invoke the offices of a commission who may say to them you must pay only such a percentage of their own money to depositors in every sixty days. I believe I state the provisions of the law correctly, and will be glad to be corrected if I have misstated them.

The depositors of this $240,000,000 or $252,000,000 are doing business in a time when the Legislature and governor of Massachusetts felt it necessary to pass such a law in order to save the State from commercial chaos; when to permit the thrifty laboring people or merchants or manufacturers to draw their own money in accordance with the laws under which they deposited it threatened bankruptcy, broad, sweeping, and universal. But in a period the aspects of which justify such legislation by so conservative a State as Massachusetts it is proposed to say to the debtor whose assets are thus impounded that the Government withdraws the protection it threw around its enterprising citizens eleven years ago and will leave him to be hunted into pauperism, while the bank commissioners direct the holders of his money to pay him but 5, 10, or 20 per cent. each sixty days.

When was business ever so stagnant? When was it ever universally conducted with so great a chance for loss? Each quarter brings new assurances from financial prophets that we have touched hard pan, and are now to rise into prosperity. Last year our great crops, greater than we ever gathered before, were to redeem us from depression. Those crops have passed away, and the report of the first quarter of this year announces the failure of thirty-three hundred and fifty-five business houses, giving us for the year above twelve thousand bankruptcies.

The total amount involved in these failures during the first quarter of this year is $82,078,826, being $18,000,000 more than for the same quarter of 1876 and $28,000,000 more than for the same quarter of last year. If, as the gentleman from New York said, bankrupt laws are to afford relief at the end of a crisis, I pray you to permit this law to remain in operation; let it execute its legitimate purpose; let it remain until by the operation of our infernal laws those who feel that they stand shall have fallen, and until when after we shall have concentrated all the real estate, the machinery, and the corporate property in the country in the hands of a few cormorants we can give the masses of the business people at least the right, unembarrassed by judgment debts, to ply their energies in supporting themselves and in endeavoring to contribute to our revenues.

Look at the public revenues, shrinking, shrinking, shrinking day by day, week by week, month by month, because more and more of our people are forced into pauperism if they are laborers, and into bankruptcy if they are merchants or manufacturers, and become unable to consume dutiable or taxable goods and by such consumption to contribute to our revenues.

The receipts from internal taxes for this month are already a million dollars less than to the same date of the same month of last year, and by the end of the month they will be $1,300,000 less. Already by comparison with last year we have lost more than six millions of internal revenue, and are likely to lose a total of ten millions before the close of the year.

I beg you to pause and not precipitate further bankruptcies and enforced idleness. I beg you to leave to the embarrassed business men a gleam of hope, a little lining to the portentous cloud, and not force such men, men of intelligence, energy, and knowledge, into the ranks of those who look upon our Government as an oppressor and upon Congress as a wrong-doer. I beg you not to give to the discontented people disciplined and intelligent captains to lead them into open revolt.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman is expired.

Mr. HUNTON. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HANNA.]

Mr. HANNA. In so far as the resolutions of a State Legislature are concerned, I am here under instructions from the Legislature of my State to vote for the unconditional repeal of the bankrupt law. But were I not so under instructions, and were left to consult my own judgment, I would vote for the repeal of that law.

I regret that in the discussion of this measure an attempt has been made to withdraw our minds from the law under consideration. I do not propose to be drawn off into a discussion of questions of finance or anything of that kind; and I again state my regret that an attempt has been made to give this debate that direction.

If I were to speak for myself, I would say that in my judgment a national bankrupt law is a standing insult to the intelligence of the State governments. If I look to the experience of the past, I find that that experience proves that a bankrupt law is utterly impracticable as a measure of relief even to the honest debtor.

Let us look for a moment simply to the operation of the bankrupt law. I sympathize as much with the debtor as any man; but let us see how that law operates. I say that under the law as administered, under every act passed by the American Congress as administered, it has proved a swindle to debtor and creditor. Why is that? It is because the machinery of our Federal courts is so heavy, it requires so much money to furnish the grease to run them, and the operations of those courts are so far from the men who are to be affected by the administration of the law, that in the administration of the law the property of the debtor is swallowed up by the officers of the courts, administer them as honestly and as best they may.

I lay it down as a principle that the nearer you can get to the people with your court the more efficient will be the remedy administered and the cheaper and better for both debtor and creditor.

What is now the practical operation of this law? Take for instance my own State, which is well supplied with railroads. A man goes into bankruptcy. An assignee is appointed at the city of Indianapolis. The bankrupt we will suppose resides in one of the outer counties. In so far as his creditors come forward and voluntarily pay their indebtedness, so far collections are made. As soon as the cream is thus skimmed off, what follows? Why, at the capital of the State the effects of the bankrupt are put up for sale. Who at Indianapolis knows what they are worth? Nobody. Some man perhaps from the locality of the bankrupt may slip in and bid what he chooses; and the entire assets of the bankrupt are thus swallowed up. The course pursued is a swindle upon the honest debtor as well as the honest creditor, because the honest debtor desires that his property shall go to pay his debts.

Has it come to this that the people of Indiana and of the other States have not intelligence enough to pass insolvent laws and assignment laws which will better subserve the interests of debtor and creditor than this legislation which we now propose to repeal? Why, suppose a man dies in one of the outer townships of your county; I submit to you as men of practical, common sense whether an administrator living in the immediate locality will not collect more money out of the assets of the deceased than will a man ten, fifteen, or twenty miles distant, who may not be conversant with all the surroundings of the deceased. I submit to you whether a court sitting in the county where the debtor resides is not in a position to be better conversant with the facts of the case than a court sitting away off at the capital of the State. I submit to you, taking mankind as ordinarily found, of average honesty, of average fairness—when an honest man comes forward and says to his creditors, "Here is all I have; take it and apply it honestly and fairly so far as it may go to pay my indebtedness," will not the creditors ordinarily say, "This man has done all he can; let us give him an acquittance."

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HUNTON. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. CRITTENDEN.]

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I yield my time to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT.]

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Mr. Speaker, so far as I have been able to follow this discussion, the opponents of the repeal of the bankrupt law seem to have confounded insolvency with bankruptcy. The provision of the Constitution under which this law was enacted relates to bankruptcy; it says nothing of insolvency. Now bankruptcy is that condition in which a debtor is unable to pay his debts; and it is a judicial question whether he is in such a condition or not. It is competent for Congress to pass a law which shall give to the courts of the United States the determination of the question whether a debtor is in a condition of bankruptcy or not; and this is all that it is competent for Congress to do. Such a law is eminently wise and judicious. I believe that a bankrupt law of such a character as that is indispensable in connection with commercial business. But the existing law is not such a law. It needs amendment which will give to the courts authority to decide the question whether the debtor is in a state of bankruptcy or not, and if he be in such condition to distribute his assets among his creditors without preference.

In view of this consideration, I introduced early in the extra session a bill (H. R. No. 1529) proposing amendments to the bankrupt law which would have made it an efficient working bankrupt law, such as exists in Great Britain. That proposition was sent to the Judiciary Committee; and I to-day learn for the first time from the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] why the committee has taken no action on the subject. He has told us that after his experience of two years, after a great deal of honest, hard labor, he despaired of bringing this House and this country to a realizing sense of the nature of the legislation which is demanded by commercial interests. I agree with him; and this being so the next best thing, if we cannot properly amend the act, is to repeal it. I was astonished to hear him say to this House that he was in favor of the substitute introduced under the direction of the Committee on the Judiciary by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. McMAHON.] That substitute will aggravate every evil of the existing law. It puts it in the power of the dishonest debtor for eight months to come to hide away his assets and it takes from the honest creditor the power to compel a dishonest debtor to devote his assets to the payment of his indebtedness.

I am opposed to the substitute; and if proper amendments cannot be made to the existing law, I am in favor of the absolute and unconditional repeal of the act, without any other delay than for the adoption of the technical amendment suggested by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. KNOTT.] Every hour that we delay this action is dangerous to the best interests of this country. We are marching steadily and surely back to prosperity. We are to-day on "hard pan." I was astonished to hear the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EWING] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] propound the doctrines which they have laid down here to-day. They seem to think that the distress in this country with the attendant shrinkage of values is something local. Let me tell those gentlemen that this condition of things exists all over the civilized globe. In Great Britain, where specie payments have not been interrupted for a long period, there is the same shrinkage of values. In France, where specie payments have been resumed under a scheme which has received the unqualified approbation of these gentlemen, there is great commercial distress. In Germany, where a sound system of currency has never been departed from, equal distress prevails. The business depression and the shrinkage of values are not local but universal. They are the reaction from a speculative era; and when you have had an era of speculation there is no remedy, but through much tribulation, through shrinkage, through liquidation of indebtedness, to get back to the point where we can begin upon the foundation of solid and real values and upon honest and true money.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HUNTON. I yield to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] for five minutes.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Speaker, again in five minutes of time there is an utter impossibility of arguing to this House the proposition which I approve and which in general I shall endeavor to sustain by my vote.

I desire now to say, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Virginia having made the motion to refer this subject to the Judiciary Committee, I do not take the despondent views which have been expressed in this House by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EWING] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] and I dissent entirely from the reasons they have given for their preference for the banking law. I do not believe that the return to resumption is the cause of the wide-spread ruin in this country to-day. I believe there can be found other better, greater reasons by far than the condition of things; else why do you find it in Canada? Else why do you find it in England? Why do you find to-day, out of one hundred and sixteen cotton mills in one single city in England one hundred of them I believe have stopped; their wheels not running; their employés on a strike? They have had no experience like ours in the return to resumption and in the contraction which gentlemen talk about. Contraction, in my opinion, was an absolute necessity to national health, as medicine now and then is an absolute necessity for man to recover his normal condition.

Sir, I look forward to the future with hope, for the nearer we approach to a gold basis the nearer we approach to that point where business men can look upon affairs as the shipmaster looks upon the compass and recognizes his position, the nearer we are to safety, to comfort, and to prosperity.

But, sir, I have derived new hope from the discussion of this measure in this House. I did not suppose there were so many gentlemen on the floor who entertained the views which I have hitherto expressed. I am encouraged, and say with all my heart and strength I will devote my time in the Judiciary Committee to the amendment of the bankrupt law providing this House will adopt the motion and refer it to that committee for consideration. The encouragement received here is such I believe the committee would put itself to the work of preparing a bankrupt law which would be relieved of all the objectionable features of the present one, and at this very session of the House report it back in that perfected condition. I hope, sir, that the House will adopt the motion of the gentleman from Virginia to refer this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HUNTON. I yield now for three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WHITE.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has only six minutes remaining.

Mr. HUNTON. And I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I am obliged to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] for the courtesy of a few minutes on this question. In the brief moments allowed me for discussion I cannot philosophize on the bankrupt system of the country. Lengthy detail must be abandoned.

What is the specific question before the House? The gentleman from Virginia has moved to refer the pending bill to the Judiciary Committee. This will certainly delay final action by this House, possibly defeat the passage of the measure this session. The bill itself is brief and provides for the repeal of the bankrupt law of 1867 and all its amendments and supplements, saving, however, the validity of pending proceedings in the different bankrupt courts of the country until they are finally disposed of. I shall vote for this bill. It has already passed the Senate and the sooner it becomes a law the better it will be for the country. Refer it to the Judiciary Committee and it will be weeks, I fear, before it will again get before the House.

Sir, it has been well said there should be some bankrupt system in a country like this. The Constitution saves to the Congress the right to pass uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States. After a great convulsion like the war against rebellion it was wise to enact some law on this subject to relieve the mass of the people, particularly of one section of the country, from the weight of misfortune that crushed them, and start them upon a career of new enterprise and usefulness.

In the earlier period of its administration men who had lost all their substance in the casualties of actual conflict or through the accidents of war and derangements of trade, men who had nothing left but a willing heart to start again in the battle of life, came before the courts, made an honest showing of their assets, a full surrender, and were discharged from a mountain of debt so they could again go into the struggles of business and assist to promote the common weal. But, sir, latterly the bankrupt law has been employed as a trap in which to catch the honest business men of the country. It is full of devices, uncertainties, and perplexities. It is a dark shadow upon the fair face of the jurisprudence of the country. The sooner it is dispelled the better it will be for the currents of trade among the people. A uniform system of bankruptcy, forsooth! Uniform in what? In its invitations to the dishonest debtor to thwart and evade his honest creditor; to the relentless creditor to harass and destroy the honest debtor. I was a few years ago entertained, sitting in one of the United States courts, which is presided over by a most distinguished judge, as I listened to his honor seeking to elucidate one of the intricacies of this law from the bench to the counsel in the case, now one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States. When the judge concluded his explanation on the pending point, the counsel plaintively observed: "Well, your honor, I thought I knew something about the bankrupt law, but now discover I know nothing." Thus it is practically with the legal profession of the country. The justice of the case is lost in the tedious mazes of the endless proceedings.

Sir, I listened with surprise to the utterances of my experienced colleague [Mr. KELLEY] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EWING] in their resistance to the repeal of this law. They seek to blind it with the financial issues of the hour. They say you will push the laboring-men to revolt by adding the repeal of this law to their woes. Sir, the laboring-men are not the persons who invoke the aid of the bankrupt law. They have not the surplus means at hand to defray the necessary counsel fees and officers' charges to begin the proceedings. No, sir; they are the sufferers from the injustice of this statute. The interest of the laboring-man is the integrity and prosperity of his employer. With prosperity to the employer the laborer is happy in "his basket and store." When disaster overtakes the honest employer the laborer still gets his dues. But, sir, gentlemen talk of the creditor and debtor classes of the country as distinct and at issue. There are none such distinctively in our business interests. The employer, whom you may designate as the capitalist, is the creditor of the workingman whom he hires for his labor; the laborer is the creditor of this capitalist for his wages. The laboring-man at the close of the week or the month, or it may be when he presents his voucher for his wages, gets payment if the employer is solvent; but if misfortune has overtaken the business and bankruptcy proceedings have been resorted to, the laborer gets practically nothing.

I have no time to dwell on this. Let us imagine a business enterprise employing scores of hands with dependent families. The management suddenly stop operations; the hands are idle, the families suffering; the adroit managers suddenly resort to bankruptcy proceedings, voluntary or involuntary—either can easily be inaugurated; the United States or bankrupt court is located possibly one hundred miles away; a schedule of assets and debts is prepared; the assignee is selected, whose duty it is to collect the assets and make equal distribution, with certain preferences for wages of labor and some other matters; it is suddenly discovered the title to the most valuable part of the real estate has been vested in the wife or son or some other relative or friend of a principal stockholder or conductor of the enterprise; the creditors are shocked; the laboring-man with his ten, twenty, hundred dollars or more coming for his wages has no money to enter the contest; the court is too far away; the local attorney cannot afford to give his time and attention to begin a contest in a court so distant without expenses and compensation; in despair all is practically lost to the creditors, including the laboring-man; the assignee's account is settled and the bankrupt is finally discharged, his debts all wiped out, yet the bulk of the property still remains in the family.

This is no exaggerated picture. Away, then, with the pretense that this law is for the benefit of the laborer! It is against his interests to remain on the statute-book. Will gentlemen refer to the records of the bankrupt courts and tell me how many laboring-men have resorted to the bankrupt law to relieve their misfortunes? There are none. No, sir; let not gentlemen seek to raise the issue here that the law we would repeal is the poor man's friend. It has been his enemy. Why, sir, it has been in force since 1867, and yet business disasters have multiplied.

I would not say, no man can say, there are not many features of advantage in this law, and many instances of benefit to the individual and the community under its administration, but in the main now it is an incubus on our business society. Much money to-day lying idle would invest in mortgage or real estate security to start some new enterprise, to employ labor, were it not the fear of the perplexities and devices of bankrupt proceedings continually arising to discourage the investment. Sir, every lawyer in active practice knows he is invoked oftener to apply this law by the man who wants some improper advantage over his honest creditors than for any other purpose. It was enacted on the theory all a man's property when he failed should be taken and distributed to all his creditors. As it is administered it seeks to discover how little can be applied to honest purposes. Were this Congress to consult the interest of some lawyers, clerks, and marshals of United States courts this law would not be repealed. Consult the business public sentiment of the country—consult the men who in the private avenues of enterprise are risking their means and investing their labor, who want laws that will give certainty, honesty, and fair play to all classes, and we will not hesitate an hour to repeal this law and remove a cause of public discontent.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HUNTON. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

Mr. KELLEY. My friend [Mr. HARRY WHITE] who has just spoken, should he remain here as long as I have done, will get used to being surprised, and will not get knocked off his feet, as he was the other day by discovering that his colleague [Mr. H. B. WRIGHT] did not know of the Kiskiminetas and the Conemaugh Rivers.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I hope my colleague knows them now.

Mr. WRIGHT. What is that my colleagues are saying? [Laughter.] What is the question of my colleague?

Mr. KELLEY. I did not ask the gentleman any question. I avail myself of the two minutes allowed me to reply to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] and to tell them why prices have fallen in every country, why machinery is idle and the laboring people of all countries are in poverty and are unable to consume each other's productions or to contribute to the revenues of their government. Prices, sir, the world over, had adjusted themselves to the volume of gold, silver, and paper money in circulation, and when Germany and the United States thrust silver, which was about one-half of the metallic money of the world, out of the category of money metals, when Germany prohibited the circulation of any bank-note under $25, when the United States contracted its paper money from two thousand millions to practically less than five hundred millions, they decreed the terrible shrinkage of prices and consequent ruin which have taken place throughout America and Europe, and thus deprived the laboring people of the world of employment and of the ability to earn the means to contribute to the public revenues.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LAPHAM was recognized, and yielded fifteen minutes to Mr. BUTLER.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with such care and attention as I might to the discussion and the various views which have been expressed. I do not think with my friend from Indiana [Mr. HANNA] that a uniform system of bankrupt laws is "an insult to the States;" because I have a very high respect for those old fathers of ours who framed the Constitution and made this a provision of the Constitution the exercise of which in my judgment is as necessary for the good of the people as its correlative in the same paragraph, a uniform system of naturalization, although I believe that last system may not be so popular in Indiana, as they have there a system of naturalization of their own.

Most of the arguments which have been used here are against the administration of the bankrupt law. I agree there never has been anything so faulty. I have tried as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary three times to amend the bankrupt law so as to do away with these evils; three times to amend its fees; three times to abolish its corps of officers; three times to make it more economical and for the benefit of the people. But whenever I have brought such a measure in here I have been met with the cry of repeal; the whole thing has been taken out of the hands of the committee and all amendments voted down.

It is said to be a very defective system. That is because you will not allow any amendment. You hear of some register in bankruptcy who has made himself rich, some official assignee who is not provided for by law swallowing up all the assets; and you follow the rule that when you see a small wrong in the execution of the law you strike at the whole system itself without dealing with the particular source of that wrong. You strike at the whole system; you never amend. That has been the rule in Congress for many years. When we legislate, we legislate for a particular thing and not provide a system of laws. Some man rushes in here with a bill against a given crime which he hears of. But who has attempted to amend your crimes act of 1789? You have thereby got a thing of shreds and patches in your crimes act which no lawyer can understand nor which courts can construe.

Now, I do not understand the law as my friend does, that the assignee must be at the capital of the State. He is chosen by the creditors wherever they like to choose him, as most convenient to them and their interests.

Now, then, what shall we do? I am not going to be led into any discussion of finances upon this question. I give as part of my remarks a statement of the failures in the first quarter of the present year, compared with the two previous years, as follows:

As an indication of the course of business we give below the failures for the first three months of 1878, and at the same time, for the purpose of comparison, the failures for the corresponding period of 1877 and 1876. We regret that it is not more encouraging in its aspect, but it should be remembered that we have passed through an exceptional winter, probably the worst that has been experienced in its effect upon the general retail trade of the country during the past twenty years. The results anticipated from the abundant crops have not been realized and stocks purchased to supply wants have been absolutely unsalable, and moreover have had of necessity to be sacrificed. The shrinkage of resources during the past six months has undoubtedly, in the aggregate, been enormous and has contributed to swell the figures of the failures for the past quarter. It may also be borne in mind that the constant extension of the operations of the Mercantile Agency, by the opening of new offices, &c., has a tendency to bring into its classification a smaller class of traders whose wants are purely local, thereby increasing the number reported, and that this also contributes naturally to swell the number of failures.

Respectfully,

DUN, BARLOW & CO.,

It appears, therefore, that in the last quarter there were 3,355 bankruptcies with $82,000,000 of liabilities, against, in the corresponding quarter of last year, 2,859 bankruptcies and $54,000,000 of liabilities, and, in the same quarter of 1876, 2,806 bankruptcies with $64,000,000 of liabilities. Is not this to go on in a still increasing ratio? Under these circumstances what will you do? My friends say here, repeal this bankrupt act and send cases of insolvency back to the State laws for adjudication.

No man can get a discharge from his debt under any State law, excepting the debt has been contracted in the State after the law existed and under the State assignment laws the bankrupt property was left to be swallowed up by neighbors, friends, relatives, wife, and children of the bankrupt and nothing went to the general creditors. If you go back to that there is no discharge for the man. If a man can come before his creditors and give up his property and get a discharge there is some inducement for him to do so; but if he can get no discharge then why should he do so.

Men will pay their debts as long as they can, and when they cannot they will, if they can get a discharge, give up their property to their creditors and start anew in life; if not they will retain their property, concealing it in the hands of their relatives or friends, and therefore you breed up dishonesty.

I was surprised to hear my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] say that the repeal of this law was the only relief for the laboring-man, so that he might get his wages when his employer fails. Now the bankrupt law provides preference in the settlement of the accounts of a bankrupt for the pay of the laborer.

Mr. FRYE. Fall River illustrates that.

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly; the great mills there are going to fail for millions in a week or two and all laborers—and there are thousands, men and women—under the bankrupt law will get their dues, but you let the old system of attachment and assignment take the place of the present law and the laboring-men will get nothing.

I thought, myself, last year that the repeal of this law would be right, and if I had been here I might have voted for it, because I thought then that the number of failures were decreasing and that we had touched bottom in bankruptcy; but I find that we have not. Some time before I die, if I live to the ordinary years of man, I shall discuss the causes of this universal bankruptcy; if not before this House, elsewhere. But the facts on the paper I sent to the Clerk's desk show that at this year we have a rate of bankrupts amounting to $328,000,000 of bankrupt liabilities, while in 1857, the year of the greatest financial revulsion and distress ever known, the amount of bankrupt liabilities was only $290,000,000; so that the crisis is upon us, and the question is, will the House, on this day and at this hour, put all these men—fourteen thousand in a single year, and bankrupt honestly, for we all agree that, for some cause or other, the war if you please, our financial policy if you please, inflation if you please, the general condition of the country; never mind the cause, the fact remains—beyond the reach of hope? I do not care what the cause is of these failures, but the fact is that property has depreciated and that men who thought themselves worth hundreds of thousands of dollars find themselves in bankruptcy. Are we to outlaw these men? That is the question for all of us to consider.

If I dared to appeal to gentlemen who expect to go before their constituents next fall, I would tell them that those constituents who find, because of them, that they cannot get discharged from their debts when they have given up all their property, will be at the polls with nothing else to do except to defeat the men who placed them in that predicament. I do not care whether I stand alone upon this question. I like to stand alone. I would rather vote against this repeal if there was no one else in the House who would vote with me. I have simply a word further to say, and I want to call your attention to the fact that this bill has never been considered, and you had better send it to the Judiciary Committee for consideration. We had a little informal consideration of the bill in the Committee on the Judiciary, but we had no right to consider it, because it was upon the Speaker's table, and we only considered it because we feared that when it came before the House members would go over the fence like a flock of sheep in their votes upon it. It was said that we could not consider it, we should be obliged to take it as it came over from the Senate. There was but one short speech made upon the bill there, although our conclusion was that the bill was as faulty as all the other bills are that have come from the Senate which the House have passed without any examination whatever. This bill of the Senate does not repeal the bankrupt law at all, for the law of 1867 and the amendments to that law, which are mentioned in this bill, have been repealed for four years and six months; such is the bill that comes from the Senate. Let me refer you from the Revised Statutes, page 969, the bankrupt law of 1867 as there digested and codified. Now what does title 74 say?

All acts of Congress passed prior to said 1st day of December, 1873, any portion of which is embraced in any section of said revision, are hereby repealed, and the section applicable thereto shall be in force in lieu thereof; all parts of such acts not contained in such revision having been repealed or superseded by subsequent acts or not being general or permanent in their nature: Provided, That the incorporation into said revision of any general and permanent provision, taken from an act making appropriations or from an act containing other provisions of a private, local, or temporary character, shall not repeal or in any way affect any appropriation or any provision of a private, local, or temporary character contained in any of said acts, but the same shall remain in force; and all acts of Congress passed prior to said last-named day, no part of which are embraced in said revision, shall not be affected or changed by its enactment.

Thus you see all these acts mentioned have been repealed for four and one-half years, and the Revised Statutes provision now stands as the law, and the bill does not pretend to repeal that provision. You will not now consider this bill thoroughly, because this House is in the habit of overriding the committees, voting blindly for that which comes from the Senate, and running riot in its legislation. I speak plainly. The House is governed by newspapers, and not by reason and debate. Members are frightened at their shadow. We do not stand up here in the image of the God who made us and do legislation here like men who are sent here to deal with the greatest interests of the country, standing up here and saying that we will consider this question gravely, calmly, and quietly. We spend a day over a dog-fight, [laughter,] but not one hour over a great measure of legislation. We gather ourselves together about speakers advocating something in regard to a little trout-brook and leave a whole river of corruption to continue flowing without consideration or debate.

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. I do not rise for the purpose of discussing this measure. The time allotted me precludes argument. All intelligent men, whether farmers of the West or merchants of the East, are of one opinion regarding this subject; they all demand the unconditional repeal of the bankrupt law.

The purpose of that act was beneficent and twofold. Its object on the one hand was to protect the debtor from the operations and exactions of the creditor, and on the other hand to secure an equal distribution of assets among the creditors. Its operation has failed to fulfill expectations. Instead of yielding generous protection to the debtor class, instead of being a measure of humanity, it has been freighted with curses. The voluntary feature has been an agency of fraud, the involuntary feature an instrument of robbery and oppression. Now, while I am in favor of the repeal of this law, I do not believe that it is just or proper to pronounce judgment and sentence in the same breath. With a view of remedying what I conceive in this respect to be a defect of the Senate bill, it is my purpose to submit an amendment that this act shall go into operation on the 1st day of July next, about ten weeks hence.

In arriving at this conclusion I have not been driven by popular clamor, I have not been influenced by newspaper denunciation. I speak for all the intelligent business men of the country, who know by experience everything respecting the operation of this bankrupt law. It is not a poor man's law. No one, unless he has resources, can avail himself of the benefits of its provisions; and all of this cry that the laboring-men are assailed has no real foundation.

I was not a little surprised when my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. EWING] saw fit in his discussion of this measure to intrude upon this House his peculiar notions upon finance and to undertake to speak here in behalf of my constituents, making the bold declaration that they are in favor of the repeal of the resumption act. Sir, this I flatly deny. My constituents are intelligent men; so intelligent that they view with utter indifference and contempt all the fierce denunciations of the gentleman from Ohio and his friends against the creditors of the country. They recognize the fact that the resumption of specie payment is to-day virtually accomplished. What is needed is the revival of confidence in the community and among the business men of the country. That confidence cannot be restored so long as this law remains in operation, whereby dishonest people can take advantage of its provisions and cheat their creditors. Statistics give us sufficient knowledge of what has been the operation of this law. Before it went into effect the dividends of bankrupts or insolvents amounted on an average to 33 per cent; since this act has been in operation they do not exceed 11 per cent. This statement in itself is a sufficient argument for the repeal of this law.

I concur with what has been said by my colleague [Mr. CHITTENDEN] in regard to the substitute that has been proposed for the Senate bill. I believe that is even more objectionable than the law which is to-day in force. It leaves in force the most vicious and obnoxious provisions of the act. Having made these remarks, I move the amendment which I have indicated, to add to the Senate bill the words "this act shall go into operation on the 1st day of July, 1878."

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. With pleasure.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to ask the gentleman whether the assets of decedents, if they get into the hands of good lawyers in New York, usually leave 11 per cent. of the estate to the objects of their beneficence?

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. What I said has no reference to New York or Philadelphia; the statistics apply to and embrace the whole territory of the United States.

Mr. KELLEY. I thought that perhaps the gentleman knew that lawyers ate up estates, whether bankrupt or not.

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. The gentleman has many fancies; this is one of them; he has fancies no less strange and incomprehensible in regard to the protective tariff, and also in regard to inconvertible currency. The gentleman's inquiry is neither germane nor ingenious.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Will my colleague allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. With pleasure.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to say in his speech that there is a class of men living out of the bankrupt law, who have not been mentioned here to-day, while we seem to be so anxious for the poor? I refer to a large body of lawyers who are able to exert influence even upon legislative bodies, and who live out of the bankrupt law.

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. As what my colleague has said does not seem to be a question, I have nothing to say in reply to it, except that I concur fully with his suggestion.

Mr. STENGER. I am opposed to the motion made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] to refer this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary. I trust that we are now within six weeks of the adjournment of the present session of Congress. In my judgment the best thing for this Congress to do is to pass the appropriation bills, repeal the bankrupt law, and go home. [Cries of "Good!" "Good!"]

The Committee on the Judiciary as well as every other committee of this House is now overwhelmed with work. What, then, does this reference to the Committee on the Judiciary mean? It means simply that this iniquitous law upon our statute-book, which no gentleman upon the floor of this House to-day has had the boldness to defend, must stand as the law of the land. I desire gentlemen of this House to understand that when they cast their votes to refer this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary they vote to leave in existence the bankrupt law as it stands at present. I do not think there can be a doubt upon that question.

Now, sir, I am opposed equally to the substitute offered by the majority of the committee. If this bankrupt law is to be repealed, I believe it ought not to stand another day; and therefore I am in favor of its absolute, unconditional repeal. Why? Because I believe if the acts repealing the bankrupt law which have been twice passed by the House of Representatives had become the law of the land, they would have done more to revive the business prosperity of this country than any other act that has been passed by the Forty-third or the Forty-fourth Congress.

I take the position that the existence of this bankrupt law tends to lock up capital; that it is decidedly at war with the interests of the laboring-men and of the men of moderate means throughout this country. I speak not for the large commercial cities; I speak for the agricultural, the rural districts; and I say there is not an attorney upon the floor of this House who does not know that when his client comes to him to ask counsel as to the loaning of money this bankrupt law comes up between the lender and the borrower always. Men having money to lend are afraid of it. Why? They fear that the men of New York, the colossal merchants of large cities, who have claims against the debtor residing in the rural districts, may come in ahead, sweeping him out of existence, and that thus those residing in his immediate neighborhood who have lent him money will lose it. Where is a man in the rural districts to look for the money that he wants? Not to those New York or Philadelphia or Boston merchants, but to the man who lives in his own community, who knows him, and because he knows him, will trust him.

I believe it to be one of the first duties of this House to repeal this law to-day; and in this mode we are benefiting the laboring men of the country. The distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EWING] has made his appeal here in behalf of the laboring classes. "You must not stir them up," he says. How are the laboring classes interested in this matter? Why, sir, I would if I could wipe out this law and leave the laboring masses of Ohio to the beneficent provisions of the law of that State, which, as I understand, gives every laboring-man and every debtor an exemption from levy and execution to the extent of one thousand dollars' worth of his property. Then the men who employ laborers would be able to borrow the money they need to carry on their business. It is folly to talk of labor prospering in antagonism to capital, and capital will only seek investments that are reasonably secure. It is exceedingly timid, and I firmly believe that, if money has been hoarded, as I do not doubt it has been to a large extent outside of commercial centers during the past decade, it has been owing chiefly to a fear of the provisions of the bankrupt law, to a dread or apprehension that the securities offered would not be good on account of the existence of this law. I may be wrong about this, but I know that the honest people of my district have regarded the law as an enemy against whose operations it behooved them to be always on guard.

But I care not at this point of the argument how the repeal may affect men who are tottering and ready to fall. The question with me is how does it affect millions upon millions of men of moderate means who want to get money to start in business, to set the wheels of enterprise in motion. To-day they cannot get the money simply because their neighbors say, "No, we will not lend money with this bankrupt law staring us in the face, under which creditors from abroad may come in and sweep all your property away from us."

But the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] says that this measure has been brought in here without consideration. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that I do not see him in his seat, for I should like to address to him the question who is responsible for its being brought here without consideration. If it has been brought here in that way, I say, without violating any secrets of the committee, that upon his shoulders more than upon those of any other member of the committee the responsibility rests.

For my part, Mr. Speaker, I go further than most gentlemen here. I grant, of course, that a bankrupt law is constitutional, because the Constitution provides for the establishment of "uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy throughout the United States." But I do not believe in the policy of putting that provision of the Constitution into operation. I do not believe in a bankrupt law. Upon principles of abstract justice, I can see no reason why a majority of a man's creditors should forgive the debt which he owes to other creditors. I believe that the true basis of credit and business prosperity rests upon the idea that when a man makes a promise to pay money or to do a certain act he will be held responsible to pay that money or to do that act. This is the true principle upon which all business should be carried on. If this principle were adopted we should not need any system of bankruptcy. For these reasons, I advocate the unconditional repeal of the law.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Speaker, there is probably not a single member on this floor, or certainly but very few, who would favor the retention of the bankrupt law as it now stands upon the statute-book. There are men like my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] or my friend from Ohio [Mr. EWING] who, apprehending that universal bankruptcy was soon to be upon us, are willing that even the defective and mischievous machinery of the existing law should be used in the emergency as a shelter for bankrupts, however inadequate that law to shield from ruin or alleviate its calamities. There are gentlemen like my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] who desire to maintain uniform bankrupt laws in the country and who, deprecating various and inefficient State laws on the subject, would rather have the most wretched system that ever was devised than consent to the abolition of a law confessedly bad in whole and in part. I can understand the purpose of holding a bad law over us to spur Congress into making another only a degree better, under the theory that at all times we ought to have one of universal operation. There are men, too, like the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE], who, as the result of this day's debate, have become hopeful, have been stimulated by a diagnosis of the condition of the House into believing that some law may be framed which will obviate the defects of the existing act and furnish a more perfect bankrupt system for the country. The gentleman from Maine during six months' sittings of this House and of the Judiciary Committee has matured no bill, brought no completed measure into this House; but now in the closing days of this session he comes and proposes to do better in the next thirty days than he has done in the past six months. If they will only send these bills back to them good bills can speedily be matured, and bills that he seems to hope can be as speedily passed through both Houses.

What have the Judiciary Committee presented? They offer a substitute for the Senate bill which extends the voluntary clause of the bankrupt law until the 1st day of January next. That is all they offer us. Is that any better than the unconditional repeal? Is not that a direct invitation to every dishonest debtor in the country to go into bankruptcy? Would such a provision be better for any honest man engaged in business? Such a measure says to all the business men of the country who meditate on the possibility of bankruptcy, "You must hurry up and go into bankruptcy before the 1st day of January next or you cannot do it at all." I, for one, say, sir, that such a substitute does not really touch the question involved, is only pernicious in so far as it differs from the Senate bill. I prefer, and I hope this House will prefer, unconditional repeal.

What is the bankrupt law? Sir, that law in its practical operation has been a tissue of mischiefs and embarrassments to debtor and to creditor. Among the people of my own State it has proved simply a method of swallowing up estates in exorbitant fees. The estates of bankrupts under the existing law pay creditors 4, 8, and 10 per cent. at the utmost when they pay anything. The declaring of the dividend to the creditors is not really giving creditors the share of the estate belonging to them. The bankruptcy courts and lawyers and machinery have eaten it all. "It was an excellent oyster, gentlemen; the court awards you a shell each," and the beggarly percentage paid is simply the notification that the cumbrous machinery has done its work and that the property has been eaten up. The small dividend paid is merely an apology for closing the business. It is a system that has greatly embarrassed men in business, which has proved extravagant in its administration, and which ought to be summarily abolished whether we ever get a better law or not. Indeed I know of no portion of that bankrupt law which would make a foundation for a better or honester structure.

I have learned this morning from the gentleman who has charge of the bill in the Senate that after an effort of months the Judiciary Committee of that body was unable to report to the Senate any bill modifying the existing law. The only bill they could report was a bill for its unconditional repeal. I believe that this House ought to repeal that law by passing the bill which has come down to us from the Senate, as this will undoubtedly be our last opportunity this session. I believe that if the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] are sincere in what they tell us, if they are hopeful of the better light that has dawned on this committee, they can do better than they have done. They can mature a bill suitable to them and present it to the judgment of the House, which I hope will long and carefully ponder over it. The question here simply is in reference to the continuance of the present bankrupt law, and I hope the House will promptly pass the Senate bill providing for its repeal. I am sure the general sentiment of my State calls for this. I believe it is called for by the general sentiment of the country. If a good bankrupt law is needed, a good bankrupt law will be made.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CALKINS. I am obliged to the gentleman from New York for yielding to me five minutes to say to the House why I shall vote for the unconditional repeal of the bankrupt law. I, however, believe, Mr. Speaker, it is a good policy for the Government to pass bankrupt laws at intervals of a few years in order to relieve citizens who have become embarrassed from the debts which they have contracted, but I do not believe it is good policy to have a general bankrupt law extending through all time to come.

One thing, sir, seems to have been forgotten by gentlemen who have spoken of the bankrupt law as a benefit to the debtor class. Incidentally I admit it is; but all bankrupt laws have been founded upon the idea it was the duty of the Government to seize the property of the individual bankrupt and distribute it proportionately among his creditors. It was on that idea the first bankrupt law was passed. Then the bankrupt became civilly dead. The moment the Government interfered and seized his property and parceled it out he became civiler mortuus and was liable, as all other debtors were at that time, to be imprisoned for debt. As an incident growing out of advancing civilization, the prison doors were after a while opened and the debtors allowed to go free. Thus crept into existence the bankrupt laws and debtors were discharged on their own application. Coming down to us founded on that theory our bankrupt laws have been passed. I assert that not one has been enacted on any other theory than it was a benefit to the creditor class, and not to the debtor class, except as a mere incident.

Now I say the present bankrupt law is for the benefit of persons who control large estates, and not for the small ones. To-day, although the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EWING] grew eloquent over the fact that it was the only thing between them and ruin, blighting all their hopes for years to come, I say to him, no man can go into voluntary bankruptcy and be discharged from his debts without paying 30 per cent., unless he gets the petition of a majority of those who have proved their claims against him. To-day, sir, no man can be put into involuntary bankruptcy under the provisions of the existing law, unless he gets one-fourth in number and one-third in interest to petition for his bankruptcy, and then his debts have to amount to more than a certain sum prescribed in the act.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] said the laboring classes were protected; that the moment a person or corporation was put into bankruptcy theirs became preferred debts. I admit it, but, no matter how many are employed, the moment the court seizes the property of the bankrupt they are turned out and their labors are at an end. The moment this property is seized under the law that moment, no matter how many are employed, they are all turned out and their labor is at an end.

But, Mr. Speaker, without stopping to discuss further the provisions of the act, I must needs give my reasons for voting for the repeal without a discussion of the subject, the time being limited. The fact remains, under the operations of this law, while it has been upon the statute-book, it has been a constant and crying fraud upon all classes of people. In addition to those given by other gentlemen who have preceded me, I name one evil which directly flows from it. The moment the property of a bankrupt is seized his stock is put into the market and sold at bankrupt prices, and it comes into competition with every article manufactured at great cost. Every single article which is sold and sacrificed at these bankrupt sales comes into competition with every like article manufactured and produced. So it is all over the country.

Another abuse, Mr. Speaker, and a crying abuse, so that it has become almost a synonym over the country, is that, no matter how large the estate of a bankrupt may be, the moment the officers seize it, that moment it melts away so that none has paid to exceed 20 per cent. of the amount of the debts, although when they were marshaled it seemed as if in many instances they could pay dollar for dollar.

It will not do to say the Judiciary Committee shall perfect a bill which will run for all time to come, because if we are to judge of the future by the past the Judiciary Committee of the House and Senate will not do it. They have had ample opportunity, but they have always disagreed.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BURCHARD. Mr. Speaker, the subject of the repeal or amendment of the bankrupt act has been before Congress, I think, for over six years. I recollect in the Forty-second Congress, when the committee brought in a bill proposing to remedy some of the evils which have been portrayed to-day, the House by a vote of three to one decided to repeal the whole act instead of amending the objectionable portions of it. The judgment of the House from session to session has sustained the action at that time. It is the judgment of the country, the desire of the commercial world, creditors and debtors, and of all lawyers acquainted with the practical working of the law, that it should be repealed on account of the frauds, injustice, and injurious effects resulting from the law, and in obedience to the demands of the country it seems to me an imperative duty to repeal the act immediately. If the amendment proposed by the Judiciary Committee is not absolutely necessary I should like to have the House concur without sending the bill back for further action. If it is necessary, as members of the committee say, I am willing to vote for that amendment.

As to the amendment proposing to repeal the involuntary features of the law and to leave voluntary bankruptcy, I think that would make the act unfair, one-sided, and unjust. It would present an inducement for fraud. If there is such inducement now, greater inducements and opportunity would be offered under such a provision. If this is right, why should it not stand as a permanent part of the law? Nobody contends it should stand by itself, giving the bankrupt alone the right to avail himself of the provisions of a bankrupt law. Why leave it in force for a few months? Gentlemen advocating it have spoken of the distress of the country. I want to say a word on that subject. It is true there are individuals in distress. Always in the history of all countries there are increased failures upon a falling market. We have had in this country within thirty years three periods of the inflation and decline of prices presenting similar phenomena and financial results—a rise in prices until 1837, a fall until 1861, again a rise from 1861 to 1865, and from the latter year until 1869 a decline. Again an advance up to 1872 and down again to the present period. When there was an advance in prices men thought they were making money. If they held their property during all the period from the rise to the fall they found themselves financially just where they were when they started; but if during that period they disposed of their property at the high prices they gained of course by the advance. The purchaser must by the decline lose all that the seller has made, and his investment may and often does involve him in liabilities that the property itself will not suffice to discharge. Loss and failures are the inevitable result of a falling market, and they will be the heavier and more frequent when the inflation of prices above the usual rates has been the greatest.

The country is in this condition to-day. It has returned from the speculative, unhealthy, and fictitious prices of 1872 to real values and prices such as ruled prior to 1860. It is the necessary and unavoidable road to a sound business prosperity, and failures must attend speculative purchases, visionary schemes, and even well-planned enterprises and investments rendered profitless by a decline in prices.

Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that while some individuals may be in distress in consequence of this condition of affairs, the country itself is prospering. It is going on increasing from year to year in the development of its mineral and agricultural resources, and is not retrograding in manufacturing production. Take all the great products of the field and farm and you will find they are increasing from year to year. I have here a statement from the Commissioner of Agriculture showing the amount of the great agricultural staples and the number of live animals in 1877. It shows an enormous increase since the census of 1870 was taken, and far greater than during the decade from 1860 to 1870, which gentlemen mistakenly refer to as a period of greatest prosperity because it was a period of inflated prices and speculation.

This statement shows that the farmers, who constitute 47 per cent. of all the laborers of the country, are busy in the field and not howling about the condition of the country. The aggregate quantity of land under the plow and in grass and pasture increased from ninety millions of acres in 1870 to one hundred and twenty-one millions of acres in 1877. It shows that somebody has been at work during the last year. Thirty millions of acres—one third more in cultivation now than eight years ago!

I noticed this cheering progress in remarks I made in the House two years ago. Desiring to ascertain if this progress still continued I addressed a letter to the Commissioner of Agriculture, whose reply and further answer I desire to submit to the House as it contains the statements to which I have alluded:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C., April 6, 1878.

SIR: The results of annual investigation of comparative numbers and values of farm animals made in January show an increase in numbers, except as to sheep, a reduction due to the destructive drought in California. Values have declined in the general shrinkages of all values of late, except as to cattle, which are more in demand for foreign shipment of beefs. The decline in value of sheep is scarcely appreciable. Aggregate numbers and average prices are as follows:

Animals.	Number.	Average prices.
Horses	10, 229, 700	$58 16
Mules	1, 637, 500	63 70
Cows	11, 360, 100	26 41
Oxen and other cattle	19, 223, 300	17 14
Sheep	35, 740, 500	2 25
Hogs	32, 262, 500	4 98

The crop estimates, as far as perfected, show an increase in quantity of all crops except barley, and a decrease in average value in everything except wheat, the price of which has been kept up by the foreign demand. The cotton crop will be nearly as large as that of 1875, which was never exceeded except in 1860. The aggregate values of the crops of wheat, corn, and oats exceed, respectively, those of last year. The preliminary statement of quantities and values is as follows:

Crop.	Quantity.	Value.
Corn	1, 360, 000, 000 at 35 cents.	$476, 000, 000
Wheat	360, 000, 000 at $1.07.	385, 200, 000
Rye	22, 100, 000 at 60 cents.	13, 260, 000
Oats	405, 200, 000 at 28 cents.	113, 456, 000
Barley	35, 600, 000 at 60 cents.	21, 360, 000

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, April 16, 1878.

SIR: In response to your request for the acreage, as well as the quantity and value of crop of 1877, I repeat the table, with the areas in crops added, as reported to me by a statistician of the Department. There was an inadvertent error in a single figure in the corn estimate, which is corrected in this table. There are minor details in the estimates of some of the more distant States not entirely completed, but they will not change the aggregates in any material degree. The table is as follows:

Crop.	Price.	Quantity.	Area, in acres.	Value.
Corn	$0 35	1, 340, 000, 000	49, 800, 000	$469, 000, 000
Wheat	1 07	360, 000, 000	26, 550, 000	385, 200, 000
Rye	60	22, 100, 000	1, 500, 000	13, 260, 000
Oats	28	405, 200, 000	13, 300, 000	113, 456, 000
Barley	60	35, 600, 000	1, 650, 000	21, 360, 000

Respectfully,

Hon. H. C. BURCHARD,
House of Representatives.

WM. G. LE DUC, Commissioner.

A comparison of these figures furnished by the Commissioner with the last census returns will show the immense gain in this short period. I will submit the latter for convenient comparison:

*The above crops except cotton.

The gentleman from New York referred the other day to the condition of the industries of the country. It is a fact that there was more coal mined in 1876 and 1877 than there was in 1870. In 1870 there were only twenty-nine million tons of coal mined in this country and last year there were forty-seven million tons of coal mined in the country. The miners are at work. I wish I had time to proceed to show the increasing production of manufactured articles, which indicates that the country itself is not going to destruction, although individuals are distressed, but I must take another occasion hereafter.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LAPHAM. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. HOOKER.]

Mr. HOOKER. I am indebted to the gentleman from New York for the opportunity of continuing for a few moments the remarks I was making on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON.]

If what is alleged in opposition to the bill which has passed the Senate, and which is now under consideration by the House, is to be listened to as an argument and a reason why we should not repeal the bankrupt law, that conviction would be produced by the extraordinary statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] who undertook to show that the number of bankruptcies and the amount had greatly increased within the past year. But if that is the case, so far from effecting its object after standing upon that statute-book for eleven years—an unprecedented period in our history—if that has been the way in which it has executed itself, then this law may be said to be rather a breeder of bankrupts than a discharger of bankrupts. It was enacted originally in 1867, amid the terrible disasters of the years which succeeded the war. It was intended, as all bankrupt laws under our system of Government have heretofore been intended, to give that form of temporary relief to the embarrassed condition of the country which it requires. As was well remarked by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. LAPHAM,] in the period following the terrible disasters and pecuniary distresses of 1857, probably more terrible than those which existed in 1867, you allowed the bankrupt law of that time to continue on your statute-book only for two years. In the last one hundred years this bankrupt law has stood upon your statute-book for eleven years, and I venture to assert, if its history could be traced, if its operations could be literally known, in every case which has transpired in every one of the Federal courts where the law has been applied in its involuntary aspect or by the voluntary applications of debtors, in every case investigated it would be found the great bulk of the debtor's property had not gone to the satisfaction of the creditor. In my own State I assert that the whole history of the bankrupt law there has not shown a dividend of 2 per cent. of the assets of the debtor to the creditor. In the State of Louisiana, as I am informed by my distinguished friend from that State, [Mr. GINSON,] he does not think that even so much as 1 per cent. has been realized.

It is true that under the law a majority of the creditors have a right to indicate who the assignee shall be, and thus to that extent they choose their own representatives; but if they fail to agree upon an assignee the court appoints one, and in Louisiana they have a general commissioner in bankruptcy who has grown rich from the proceeds of this official service. And I am informed that the amount paid out of the assets of the debtor to the creditor represents only 1 per cent. Everywhere where the law has been attempted to be executed it has injured to the benefit of the officers who had charge of its execution, and not to the benefit of the creditors.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BACON. In the month of May, a year ago, the Legislature of my State passed a resolution, with almost entire unanimity, instructing its Representatives to vote for an unconditional repeal of the bankrupt law. I do not know that that resolution has been brought to the attention of the House, for it was passed after Congress had adjourned; but having been elected at the November election preceding I may well consider it as an instruction to me, and as such I receive it. Being in entire accordance with my own views long entertained, I accept the instructions and shall vote for the unconditional repeal of the law.

Mr. Speaker, I have seen and have felt the operation of the bankrupt act and I know it leads to very great abuses; upon one pretense or another the fees of the officers whose duty it is to execute the law have increased in enormous proportion. [Here the hammer fell.] I am sorry that I cannot have an opportunity to say a few words further, but I close by announcing that I am in favor of this bill and opposed to any amendments to it.

Mr. POTTER. The repeal of the bankrupt law is not a new question. It has been before Congress often and has been discussed much. We have in the past had occasion to form our opinions of the wisdom of continuing the law, and, for that matter, so have our constituents also. We are presented to-day with an opportunity to repeal it. This House never has had such an opportunity before. Congress after Congress this House has voted by a large majority that the bankrupt law be repealed and Congress after Congress the Senate has refused to concur with us. For the first time since the subject of repealing this law has been agitated the Senate has come to the conclusion that the law ought to be repealed. If we take advantage of this opportunity we can put an end to the law, but, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STENGER] said, if the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] prevails and this bill be sent to the Committee on the Judiciary that will be an end to its passage during this session or this year. The only practical alternative presented to us now, therefore, is shall the law be repealed or shall it be continued.

Mr. BRIGHT. I should like to know why if this bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary that committee may not report the bill back?

Mr. POTTER. They may not do it, because they are now full of bills which they have resolved to report to the House when called, which will be within a very few days, and they probably will not have another opportunity to report at all this session. It would take time to consider the bill in committee and to reconcile the conflicting views of the members of the committee, so that it cannot be hoped they would be prepared to report it at their next call, now just at hand.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, we have the alternative before us now, either to repeal the bill or let it stand, and that is the only choice we have. My colleague [Mr. HEWITT] stated that he was in favor of the bankrupt law if it could be properly amended. The present law has been eleven years in operation and it has never yet been so amended as to commend it to the people. I have hardly heard a single voice raised in defense of the law as it now is. If it has not been made defensible in eleven years what hope is there it will ever be made so? But grant that a good bankrupt law could be made, it could be made after this is repealed just as well as while this law continues on the statute-book. The question then is, whom does the pending law benefit, for what class ought it to be retained? I was surprised to hear the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EWING] say that it should be retained for the struggling merchants and the laboring classes. The only class that it seems to me to benefit are the lawyers, the clerks, the registers, the marshals, and other officers who are connected with its administration. Of course each gentleman can judge best for his own locality, but speaking for mine I must say that while there is some difference of opinion on the subject I think the general judgment is, that this law injures creditors, is no advantage to honest debtors, embarrasses trade, enriches only the officers of the bankrupt courts, and ought to be repealed.

If we are to judge from the action of this House of Representatives, which is the nearest representative of the people, the people generally do not wish to retain the law, for bills repealing the law have been passed by this House in former Congresses almost unanimously. If we are to judge by the memorials from State Legislatures and the petitions which come to us from the people, we find, at least as far as my observation goes, a prevailing expression against instead of for the law. The gentleman from Ohio stated that petitions for the repeal of this law were gotten up by prosperous traders who desired to crush out their rivals and that their weaker competitors joined in these petitions, while they really desired to preserve the law, for fear their pecuniary weakness would be suspected. I think this must have struck the House as a far-fetched suspicion. Indeed, the class interested in getting up petitions about this law are the class directly concerned to preserve it. It is the registers, the marshals, the clerks, the assignees, the lawyers in bankruptcy who stir round and mainly get up as I believe the remonstrances that come to us against the repeal of this law. I agree that there is some difference of opinion as to the law among all classes. But I think the prevailing and the better opinion is that it has been expensive, inefficient, and often oppressive, and that on the whole all classes except those concerned in conducting bankrupt proceedings would be better off without it. I think, therefore, we had better repeal it while we can. As to the substitute of the gentleman from Ohio, I agree with my colleague [Mr. CHITTENDEN] that that would be worse than the bill itself.

Mr. LAPHAM. I hope the time will come, even during this session, when the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EWING] and the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] can find a subject of discussion without appealing to the poor laborers of the country who get from one to ten cents a day for their labor under this law. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered. The first question was on the motion of Mr. HUNTON to refer the bill with the pending amendments to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 44, noes 145.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. HUNTON called for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered, there being but 28 in the affirmative, not one-fifth of a quorum.

So the motion to refer was not agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed and requested the concurrence of the House in a resolution to print extra copies of the report of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries for the year 1876-77.

The message further announced that the Senate insisted upon its amendments, disagreed to by the House, to the bill (H. R. No. 3822) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, and asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed as the conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. SARGENT, Mr. DORSEY, and Mr. BECK.

REPEAL OF BANKRUPT LAW.

The House resumed the consideration of Senate bill No. 35, to repeal the bankrupt law.

Mr. McMAHON moved to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to commit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The next question was upon the amendments moved by Mr. KNOTT, to insert after the words "the bankrupt law, approved March 2, 1867," the words "title 61 of Revised Statutes, and an act entitled 'An act to amend and supplement an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved March 2, 1867, and for other purposes,' approved June 22, 1874;" also to insert after the words "future proceedings therein" the words "and all penal actions or criminal proceedings arising thereunder."

Mr. RANDOLPH. Is it in order to move an amendment in lieu of that?

The SPEAKER. It is not; the previous question is now operating. The amendments moved by Mr. KNOTT were then agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The amendment of Mr. WILLIS, of New York, was rejected.

The question then recurred upon the substitute moved by Mr. McMAHON for the Senate bill as amended.

Mr. LYNDE. I ask for a division of the question upon that substitute, and that a vote be taken separately upon the first two sections.

The SPEAKER. That is the gentleman's right.

Mr. CONGER. I raise the point of order that a substitute must be voted upon as an entirety.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

The Clerk read the first two sections of the substitute, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That title 61 of the Revised Statutes regulating proceedings in bankruptcy, and all laws amendatory of or supplementary to the same, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. This act shall not affect pending suits, prosecutions, proceedings, or applications, nor subsequent petitions for discharge therein, nor any right of action accruing therein to assignees or others.

The question was taken upon that portion of the substitute, and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the remainder of the substitute, as follows:

SEC. 3. This act shall take effect from its passage as to all involuntary proceedings, except as provided in the preceding section; and as to voluntary applications from and after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1879.

SEC. 4. All petitions filed by an insolvent debtor before the said 1st day of January, A. D. 1879, under the law regulating proceedings in cases of voluntary bankruptcy shall be acted upon and proceeded in to final settlement, adjudication, distribution, and discharge under said title and the laws supplementary thereto or amendatory thereof, as though this act had not been passed.

The question was taken upon the latter portion of the substitute, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I now call for a vote on the substitute as a whole.

The SPEAKER. It has been voted down.

Mr. CONGER. Not as a whole; the separate parts of it have been voted down.

The SPEAKER. Then what remains of it?

Mr. CONGER. That is for the Chair to determine. The Chair ruled that the substitute should be divided.

The SPEAKER. The different parts of the substitute have been voted down, and there is nothing left of the substitute to vote upon. The question recurs upon ordering the bill as amended to a third reading.

Mr. FORT. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FORT. Has the motion been made to reconsider and table the vote by which the amendments moved by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] were adopted? I make the inquiry with the view if possible to reconsider the vote and reject those amendments, in order that the bill may not go back to the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that a motion to reconsider was made and laid upon the table.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading and read the third time.

Mr. STENGER. I now call for the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill, as amended, was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the bankrupt law approved March 2, 1867, Title 61 of the Revised Statutes, and an act entitled "An act to amend and supplement an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved March 2, 1867, and for other purposes," approved June 22, 1874, and all acts in amendment or supplementary thereto or in explanation thereof, be, and the same are hereby, repealed: Provided, That such repeal shall in no manner invalidate or affect any case in bankruptcy instituted and pending in any court prior to the day when this act shall take effect; but as to all such pending cases and all future proceedings therein, and all penal actions or criminal proceedings arising thereunder, the acts hereby repealed shall continue in full force and effect until the same shall be fully disposed of, in the same manner as if said acts had not been repealed.

Mr. EWING and Mr. KELLEY called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. O'NEILL. I think there should be a record of the vote on such an important bill as this. I want to record my vote before this law is repealed.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 205, nays 40, not voting 46; as follows:

The SPEAKER announced as the conferees on the part of the House, Mr. CLYMER, Mr. BLOUNT, and Mr. HALE.

PROTECTION OF TEXAS BORDER.

Mr. SCHLEICHER, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs a joint resolution (H. R. No. 167) relative to the protection of the Mexican border in Texas; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

VENEZUELAN MIXED COMMISSION.

Mr. HAMILTON, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, as a substitute for House bill No. 1059, a bill (H. R. ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I call for the regular order.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to move—

Mr. HUBBELL. I ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BAKER] to withdraw his call for the regular order for a few minutes, in order that I may report from the Committee on Commerce a bill for consideration at this time. It is a very important bill; and, as I am obliged to leave the city soon, I desire to have it acted upon now.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I will withdraw the call for the present.

VESSELS NOT PROPELLED BY STEAM OR SAIL.

Mr. HUBBELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to ask consent to report back, with amendments, for consideration at this time the bill (H. R. No. 1757) relating to vessels not propelled by steam or sail.

The bill, as proposed to be amended, was as follows:

Be it enacted, &c. That from and after the passage of this act all vessels employed in the navigable waters of the United States, not propelled by any internal appliances for propulsion, such as sail or steam, except vessels of this character engaged in trade with contiguous foreign territory, shall be exempt from admeasurement or enrollment: Provided, however, That the masters of registered, enrolled, or licensed vessels towing or propelling vessels of the character herein described shall be liable to produce manifests of the cargoes of vessels so towed or propelled to the collector at the port of entry or the surveyor or collector at any port of delivery nearest the place at which the delivery of any cargo of a vessel so towed or propelled shall be completed: Provided, also, That when not being propelled or towed by other vessels, and vessels of five tons burden or upward as have no internal appliances for propulsion, shall be subject to all the regulations for displaying lights, and to all the penalties for not displaying lights, which are provided for sail-vessels of the United States of the mercantile marine by sections 423 and 424 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

SEC. 2. That for receiving such manifest, and filing the same, the collector or surveyor shall be authorized to collect a fee of twenty cents for each vessel towed or propelled; and for failing to deliver such manifest of cargo the master having such vessel in charge shall be liable to a fine of $5 for every vessel unladen.

SEC. 3. That vessels not propelled by sail or steam, and not wholly owned by citizens of the United States, found transporting cargoes of American production not destined for exportation in the same vessel, on navigable waters of the United States, between one collection district and another, or places in the same district, shall be liable with their cargoes to seizure and forfeiture in any district in which they may be found.

Mr. HUBBELL. This is a very important bill, and will take a burden off the commerce of the whole country so far as barges and such vessels are concerned.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does the gentleman propose to consider the bill at this time?

Mr. HUBBELL. That is what I asked.

Mr. BLOUNT. I must object to that.

Mr. DUNNELL. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. BLOUNT. How long will it take?

Mr. HUBBELL. Not more than a minute or two.

Mr. REAGAN. I think if the gentleman will hear a brief explanation he will withdraw his objection.

Mr. HUBBELL. Under the law as it now stands, vessels and barges used mainly in navigating waters of a State are exempt from admeasurement and license, while barges not so used are subject to that fee. Therefore a barge used mainly on the waters of a State may go down the Mississippi River free from all these charges, while a barge not so used must pay admeasurement and license fee. This bill proposes to take this burden off such vessels and barges.

The amendments reported from the committee were agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HUBBELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I now insist upon the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the morning hour, and the business in the morning hour of to-day is the call of committees for reports of a private nature.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the post-office appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair deems it his duty to state to the House that the effect of that motion, if agreed to, will be to cut off private business.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. This is private-bill day, and I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] is the regular order; the effect of the motion, if adopted, will be to cut off private business.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. I know that; and I wish the House to vote down that motion.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SPRINGER. This is Friday, and private-bill day; and the first business in order is the consideration of private bills.

The SPEAKER. This is the rule:

Friday in every week shall be set apart for the consideration of private bills and private business, in preference to any other, unless otherwise determined by a majority of the House.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. This is objection day.

Mr. EDEN. I trust that we will go on with the appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Georgia is in order; but if the House desires to proceed with the consideration of private business it can do so by voting down that motion.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. BLOUNT; and upon a division there were—ayes 116, noes 34.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. RICE, of Ohio, said: This is objection day; and in order that the House may utilize it in the consideration of private bills I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. BANNING. I understand that the Committee on Invalid Pensions is on call.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. I will withdraw the call for the yeas and nays. So the motion of Mr. BLOUNT was agreed to.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. Before the House goes into Committee of the Whole I ask unanimous consent that to-night be set apart for the consideration of reports from the Committee on Invalid Pensions and for the consideration of pension bills in Committee of the Whole as on objection day.

Mr. ROBERTS. I move to amend so that all reports of a private nature from committees be in order to-night.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I object.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. I will state further—

The SPEAKER. There is objection.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. Who objects?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] on the left of the Chair.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. He is the chronic objector.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Well, I do object; we have had already a great deal of special legislation.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. MILLS in the chair.)

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and will resume the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4346) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes; and the pending amendment when the committee was last in session was that offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. TOWNSEND], to amend the paragraph commencing with line 120 so that it will read as follows:

For compensation to clerks in post-offices, $3,640,000.

Mr. DUNNELL. This amendment now proposes to appropriate $3,600,000 for this service, being $100,000 less than the estimate asked for by the Post-Office Department. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] stated the other day that it was $100,000 more than was appropriated last year, or in other words, to be more exact, that $100,000 had been added to the appropriation to meet the especial demands for the increase of clerical force in the Post-Office Department.

I am informed by the Post-Office Department that there are to-day five hundred and seventy-five applications for increase of clerical force and that most of those five hundred and seventy-five applications have been presented at different times during the present fiscal year. Now it will be noticed that this $100,000 additional would play a very insignificant part in meeting these five hundred and seventy-five cases in addition to the other cases which have arisen or will arise calling for this amount of money. The five hundred and seventy-five applications at $100 apiece would amount to $57,500. I know of many instances where the amount allowed ought to be $200, $300, or $400.

When this bill was last before the House I called the attention of the committee to the necessity for a larger amount of money than is appropriated in this bill for this special item, and I trust that the gentleman from Georgia will concede to this amendment which may be regarded as a compromise between the amount proposed by him and by those who wish to make fuller provisions for this service. It is not a dollar more than the service needs, and I hope the gentleman will not make further opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BLOUNT. If I take the gentleman's own statement there are five hundred and seventy-five applications and then the statement of the Department that the average hire of clerks in this service is $300, that would leave too much money under the appropriation already made by the bill. Last year we appropriated $3,440,000 and the amount expended was only $3,233,000, leaving a surplus of $67,000 of that amount unused.

They have, according to their own estimate, a sufficient sum to employ over six hundred men. It sometimes happens that it is very convenient for the Department, as they have said to the committee, to be able to say that they do not have sufficient appropriations. Gentlemen have friends who are unfortunate and want to be taken care of in these hard times and this is a convenient place for them to get in. But it makes no difference as to the motive; I believe that we have given an ample sum, especially in view of the fact of the falling off last year in the receipts from the Post-Office Department, and I hope that the committee will not consent to the addition of a single dollar, for I do not think there is a single member of the committee who upon examination will not feel that this appropriation is complete and ample.

The question was taken on the amendment offered by Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio, and no quorum voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. DUNNELL and Mr. BLOUNT were appointed.

The committee again divided; and tellers reported—ayes 90, noes 65.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLOUNT. I give notice that I shall ask a yea-and-nay vote in the House upon this amendment.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For payment to letter-carriers, $1,865,000.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I move to strike out all after the word "carriers," in line 122, down to and including the word "dollars," in line 123, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Two million dollars: Provided, That letter-carriers of different classes shall each be paid a larger salary than they now receive.

Mr. BLOUNT. I raise the question of order upon that amendment that it is new legislation and increases expenses.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire to be heard on that question of order. The gentleman makes the point of order that the amendment proposes to change existing law and is not in the direction of economy. The point of order is not well taken as I understand the law. The Revised Statutes, section 3865, provide as follows:

Letter-carriers shall be employed for the free delivery of mail matter, as frequently as the public convenience may require, at every place containing a population of fifty thousand and within the delivery of its post-office; and may be so employed at every place containing a population of not less than twenty thousand within the delivery of its post-office.

The next section provides as follows:

SEC. 3866. The salary of letter-carriers shall be fixed by the Postmaster-General, and shall not exceed $600 per annum; but on satisfactory evidence of diligence, fidelity, and experience, he may increase their salary to any sum not exceeding $1,000 a year each; and in San Francisco, California, he may pay such additional salaries to carriers as will secure the services of competent persons.

I hold in my hand an official statement of the number of letter-carriers in the United States, with their present salaries. These salaries, according to this statement, average $771 per annum. The object of this amendment is to increase the total amount for carriers, looking toward an increase in the number of carriers, provided the Postmaster-General should see proper to employ an additional number; but the proviso prevents any increase of the salaries above that which the carriers are now receiving. This amendment does not increase the salaries beyond what the law now provides; on the contrary, it prevents any increase of salary beyond the amounts now paid. Hence the amendment, instead of looking toward an increase of expenditure, looks toward the permanent reduction of expenditures, and is therefore in order.

Mr. BANNING. I would like to say when this question comes up that there is certainly no class of employes of the Government so poorly paid—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is discussing the merits of the amendment, not the point of order. The Chair is ready to rule on the question. He overrules the point of order made by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wanted to be heard before the Chair announced his decision.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman ought to have claimed the floor before the decision was made. But the Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BLOUNT. I regret very much that I was not heard before the Chair announced his decision.

The point of order that I raised was that the object of this amendment was to change existing laws, which would result in an increase of appropriations. What is the provision of the existing law?

The salary of letter-carriers shall be fixed by the Postmaster-General, and shall not exceed $600 per annum; but on satisfactory evidence of diligence, fidelity, and experience he may increase their salary to any sum not exceeding $1,000 a year each.

Now what does this amendment provide?

Provided, Letter-carriers of the different classes shall not be paid a larger salary than they now receive.

My impression is that this is an attempt to regulate the discretion of the Postmaster-General, and I do not think that it retrenches expenditures at all. I do not see how the amendment points to retrenchment, and it certainly changes existing law.

Mr. HANNA. The gentleman says that the object of this amendment is to reach the law regulating the discretion of the Postmaster-General. Now the law as the gentleman read it gives the Postmaster-General, as I understand, a discretion to increase the compensation of carriers from $800 to as much as $1,000 in particular instances. Now if we only appropriate enough to pay the minimum, do we not thereby in an appropriation bill deprive the Postmaster-General of the discretion which he now has under existing law? Would not that be the effect of the appropriation?

Mr. BLOUNT. So far as the appropriation is concerned, we are following the law; but this amendment undertakes to regulate directly the discretion of the Postmaster-General.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The gentleman will allow me a moment. The amendment in no way interferes with the discretion of the Postmaster-General except to curtail that discretion. At this time letter-carriers throughout the United States are receiving on an average $770 a year each. This being the amount they are now receiving by the regulation of the Postmaster-General, this amendment, instead of leaving him the discretion to increase this pay from $800 to $1,000 in particular instances, provides expressly that in no event shall he use that discretion to increase the pay of these carriers beyond the amount they now receive.

Mr. WADDELL. Does the gentleman mean to limit the maximum pay of letter-carriers to $770?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. To what they are now receiving.

Mr. WADDELL. They now average $770 annually; and if I understand the gentleman correctly his object is to fix the maximum pay of letter-carriers at $770 per annum, doing away with the discretion of the Postmaster-General to grant an increase beyond that sum.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The amendment proposes to fix the maximum pay of letter-carriers at just what they are receiving at this time.

Mr. WADDELL. Then why does the gentleman desire to increase the appropriation for letter-carriers, if he reduces the pay?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I will explain that as soon as the point of order is out of the way.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Georgia to make the point of order on the amendment that it changes the existing law and is not in the direction of retrenchment of expenses.

Mr. BLOUNT. The ruling which has heretofore been made is, where there is a change of existing law proposed it must appear upon the face of the amendment; it retrenches expenditures, or otherwise it is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is unquestionably right. The Chair, however, cannot see this changes existing law.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask the Chair whether the discretion of the Postmaster-General to fix the salary at $800 or any sum below that is not a matter of law, and whether the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois does not restrain that discretion as to the amount to be paid these letter-carriers at this time, in some instances less and in one more, the object being to restrain their discretion. Is not that a change in the existing law?

The CHAIRMAN. The Postmaster-General may make an increase in the number, but he cannot make the appropriation of money. At last Congress must make the appropriation of money. Whatever the discretion the Postmaster-General may have in increasing or decreasing the number of letter-carriers Congress must make the appropriation of money.

Mr. BLOUNT. This will require a larger appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you must change the law as it exists, but this amendment does not propose that.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, if I can get the attention of the committee I will try to make myself understood as to what I desire to accomplish by this amendment.

There are eighty-seven cities in the United States in which the letter-carrier system is operating. Outside of these cities the postage on a drop-letter is one cent. In the letter-carrier cities the postage on a drop-letter is two cents. Now this postage, as well as the postage on all other matter mailed for delivery in such city where mailed, is styled local postage, and if the local postage in a given city is as much as the salaries of the carriers the service in such city is claimed to be self-sustaining.

Now, in the city of New York the local postage exceeds the salaries of letter carriers, in round numbers.

In Philadelphia.....	$742,000
In Boston.....	132,000
In San Francisco.....	5,000
	18,000

In the aggregate, say..... 1,897,000 while in the other eighty-three cities the local postages are eaten up entirely by the salaries of letter-carriers, and $640,000 besides. To instance a few of them, (and I will only refer to the large cities in this connection, for I am satisfied in all cities of fifty thousand inhabitants and under the carrier system should be abolished.)

The local postages fell short of the salaries of letter-carriers in Baltimore, last year..... $30,000

New Orleans.....	26,000
Saint Louis.....	53,000
Cincinnati.....	17,000
Chicago.....	52,000
Cleveland.....	12,000
Detroit.....	15,000
Louisville.....	13,000
Pittsburgh.....	9,000
Washington.....	11,000
Indianapolis.....	23,000

Now, if we can ascertain the cause of the profit in the four cities first named and the deficit in the other large cities, and by legislation place this system upon a self-sustaining basis in all the cities, it would be well so to do. In the city of New York where the profit is so large the force of carriers is sufficient to gather up from the mail-boxes and deliver the mail from five to seven times daily, and while the service is not so frequent in Philadelphia and Boston, yet it will average from three to five times daily. Now, this business is like any other, if it is worth attending to at all it is worth doing well; and in these cities where it is sufficient to satisfy the demand, as before stated, it is done at a profit of $1,000,000 annually. Now, in Chicago, Saint Louis, and other cities the force of carriers is not large enough to make so frequent deliveries of letters and other mailable matter, the result is that other means of delivery are used by the citizens. I had an interview with the very competent postmaster at Chicago, Mr. Palmer, a few months ago, and he informed me while the carriers made from two to three deliveries of letters daily in the business part of the city, that in other parts of the city there was no certainty of more than one delivery daily; so to a large extent the people did not depend upon the carriers, but employed other messengers, and he expressed himself clearly of the opinion that an additional number of carriers would greatly improve the revenues from local postages; and I am informed by other persons conversant with this matter that such would be the case in the other large cities; so I am satisfied that it would be genuine economy to adopt this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's five minutes have expired.

Mr. MCCOOK. I am anxious to hear this question discussed, and therefore take the floor and yield my five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I thank the gentleman. Having shown, as I think, the propriety of the first branch of my amendment, I now desire to speak to the second branch of the amendment, which has the effect, if the $130,000 additional is appropriated for this service, that it shall be used for the employment of additional carriers in these cities and not for the increase of the salaries of those already employed; for the amount recommended by the Committee on Appropriations is sufficient to pay the present force of carriers the salaries they are now receiving; and unless the force of carriers is to be increased where it can be profitably done to the Government, then I am not for any increase of this appropriation. For, Mr. Chairman, while I am for paying everybody a fair salary, and while I do not underestimate the very important service of the letter-carriers, yet the fact is that the letter-carriers are paid, everything considered, a better salary than most other postal employes receive.

In cities of 100,000 population, and over, there are, in the aggregate 1,682 carriers—

168 of these receive now per annum	$675
202 of these receive now per annum	775
1,222 of these receive now per annum	875

While in cities of less than 100,000 population there are—

72 carriers who receive per annum	$575
51 carriers who receive per annum	675
470 carriers who receive per annum	775

Less, I should state, 5 per cent. on account of the reduction of the appropriation for the present fiscal year, and it is instructive to know that at the commencement of this fiscal year, when the appropriation was not sufficient to pay the number of carriers in the service, they universally preferred the reduction of salary by 5 per cent. to the discharge of 5 per cent. of the force. Now let us compare their salaries with some of the other postal employes, for instance the clerks in post-offices where the salaries of the postmaster is $2,000 and upward. The Postmaster-General's report shows that these clerks number forty-four hundred and sixty-five, and their average annual compensation is $724.11, while the average pay of the letter-carriers is $770 per annum.

Mr. O'NEILL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. O'NEILL. I wish to correct the gentleman or to make a suggestion to him that the clerks in the post-offices work but eight hours out of the twenty-four; in other words, they are divided into three classes and spell each other. The carriers, on the other hand, work from six o'clock in the morning until eight at night, every day and night.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The gentleman may be right as regards Philadelphia; but generally the clerks in the post-offices throughout the country commence in the morning at seven o'clock and quit at seven in the evening.

Mr. O'NEILL. I think the gentleman is mistaken in his information.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I know how it is at least in the great majority of the post-offices as regards this matter, the clerks are constantly on duty.

But to go on with the comparison. The annual compensation of the route agents in the United States, 1,065 in number, is $335; 248 mail-route messengers, at $694.50; 1,051 railway postal clerks, at $1,163.36; (it will be recollected that these three last classes of employes are on expense away from home when on duty and subject to railway accident, while the carrier is free from that additional expense and danger;) 136 local agents, at an average annual compensation of $775; 37,345 postmasters, at average annual compensation of $195.06. So I say, in conclusion, that it appears from these facts, everything considered, the letter-carriers are better paid than most of the other postal employes; and while I think in a few large cities we need a few more letter-carriers at the present pay the salaries should not be increased. Hence I hope both the first and second clauses of my amendment will be adopted.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PAGE. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. O'NEILL. I do not desire to anticipate a discussion upon the subject of the increase of the pay of letter-carriers; but I think this is an attempt to forestall the action of the committee upon a bill which has been well digested by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and which has been reported favorably and is now on the Calendar and will soon be reached; reached, I hope, within a few days, if it should not be ruled in order as an amendment. Over two thousand ill-paid and fearfully worked men are anxiously awaiting the favorable action of Congress. I presume, however, after this amendment is disposed of, and I hope it will be voted down, that the gentleman from Ohio, from one of the Cincinnati districts, [Mr. BANNING,] will offer an amendment bringing up squarely before the Committee of the Whole now the question of the increase of the pay of the letter-carriers of the various cities where the free-delivery system has been established.

Wherever the free-delivery system exists in the large cities you find that it pays, in the aggregate, a million of dollars. The gentleman's [Mr. CANNON] illustration about other modes of communication in Chicago applies as well to other cities. In the cities of Philadelphia and New York they have the most complete system of local telegraphy, besides large numbers of messengers, also a private enterprise and very convenient, being regularly employed for delivering messages quickly by day and night. But when the gentleman undertakes to argue that letter-carriers under the free-delivery system are as well paid as any other set of men, I think the good sense of this committee will not agree with him. To be a clerk in a post-office is to be engaged in quite a different line of duty from a letter-carrier. The post-office clerks in large cities are not engaged in duty from morning until night excepting a few of them. They may be so engaged in the offices which have not the free-delivery system; but in the post-office in the city of Philadelphia, and of course it must be so also in New York and Boston and Baltimore and Chicago, the clerks are necessarily spelled, not all of them, but most of them; and in Philadelphia I know they generally work but eight hours, there being a division of the hours of the day, so that while a proper proportion are on duty others are resting. Indeed the work of the clerks is very hard while they are doing it, and their compensation is by no means large when you take into consideration intelligence, reliability, and systematic business habits, such as I know the clerks in the Philadelphia post-office possess.

But what I wish to call the attention of the committee to is this: that should this amendment be adopted it will be considered as having forestalled and decided a question as to whether these hard-worked men, the carriers in the larger cities, or wherever they are, should not be paid a proper compensation for their labor. And in my opinion the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is seeking to commit members against the increase of the salaries of these overworked officials. He is pressing his amendment purposely to defeat the general proposition for increase. He need not tell me that the letter-carrier who works from early morning until late at night, exposed to all kinds of weather, and has a salary of seven or eight hundred dollars a year, is as well paid as a clerk in the Departments here at $1,200 or a clerk in a post-office getting $1,000 or more, measuring the labor by the number of hours of constant employment. Sir, the labor is entirely different. These letter-carriers perform a ceaseless duty which is a convenience to every man's business and which accommodates every citizen and gives every one an opportunity of corresponding frequently in relation to his business or other interests. I think the committee should be inclined to vote down this amendment, and then have an amendment offered providing directly for the increase of pay of letter-carriers.

Mr. LUTTRELL. One question; do you find any difficulty in employing men at the present rate of pay?

Mr. O'NEILL. We do not find any difficulty in employing men at the present rate, but that is no answer to what I have suggested. We want good reliable men in these places, and they ought to be well paid.

Mr. EDEN. Are we proceeding under the five-minute rule?

The CHAIRMAN. We are.

Mr. EDEN. I would be glad if the Chair would enforce the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not know to what particular departure from the rule the gentleman from Illinois refers.

Mr. EDEN. The rule is that one five-minute speech be allowed to an amendment in favor of it and one against it.

The CHAIRMAN. But if a gentleman obtains the floor and yields his five minutes to another, it has been the custom to allow that to be done.

Mr. EDEN. The rule is that five minutes be allowed on one side and five minutes upon the other.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct; that is the rule; but the custom of the House has been otherwise.

Mr. BANNING. I offer the following amendment as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON:]

After line 123 insert as follows:

Provided, That there shall be two classes of letter-carriers; the first class to consist of all carriers who have served one year and the second class to consist of all carriers who have served less than one year. The salary of the first class shall be $1,000 per annum and the salary of the second class shall be $800 per annum; and all new appointments shall be made to the second class.

The CHAIRMAN. There is one amendment now pending.

Mr. O'NEILL. I withdraw the formal amendment I offered.

Mr. WADDELL. I ask the gentleman from Ohio before he proceeds to allow me to make an explanation.

Mr. BLOUNT. What is before the House?

Mr. WADDELL. I desire to state, as being somewhat familiar with this whole subject of letter-carriers, as chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, for the information of the House in regard to the condition of the question now before it on the pending amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, that there are one hundred and seven members of the House who represent districts where there are letter-carriers, but there is not one in the State which I represent, and therefore I have no personal interest in the matter. But I warn the gentlemen who do feel a personal interest in voting for the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois that in so doing they will be voting for an increase of the appropriation for letter-carriers to the amount of $21,000 and at the same time voting for the reduction of the pay of letter-carriers to $750 a year as the maximum.

Mr. BANNING. I now offer my amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. I raise the question of order that that amendment changes the law and increases the compensation of these letter-carriers. The law provides that they shall have a salary not exceeding $800 a year. The provision in section 3836 of the Revised Statutes was read by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON,] and I will now read it again:

The salary of letter-carriers shall be fixed by the Postmaster-General, and shall not exceed $600 per annum; but upon satisfactory evidence of fidelity and experience he may increase their salary to not exceeding $1,000, and upon the Pacific slope the salary may be fixed higher than that.

Now, sir, the object of the gentleman from Ohio is to create two classes, the pay of one of which is absolutely fixed by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] upon that question.

Mr. BANNING. The statute does not fix the salary. It says:

The salary of letter carriers shall be fixed by the Postmaster-General and shall not exceed $600 per annum, but upon satisfactory evidence of fidelity and experience he may increase their salary to not exceeding $1,000, and upon the Pacific slope the salary may be fixed higher than that.

Now this amendment is possibly a reduction of expenditures rather than an increase. It determines certainly what the law is. Under the law now all the salary that is provided for in this amendment may be paid and more than $800 a year may be paid if the carrier has shown diligence and acquired experience. The Postmaster-General may pay $1,000, and on the Pacific slope more than $1,000 may be paid. My amendment does not change the law, it determines what the law is; it does not increase expenditures, but states exactly what shall be the salary under the statute. I hope that my friend will be satisfied.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order. In the opinion of the Chair the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] is clearly in violation of existing law, and is therefore excluded as not in order.

Mr. BANKS. I give notice that when the question is taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] I shall call for a division.

Mr. KELLEY. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of replying briefly to what has been said about the pay of the letter-carriers. I regard them, and I think I understand the subject, as the worst paid and most overworked of the employés of the Government. As my colleague [Mr. O'NEILL] has said, the clerks in the large distributing offices are divided into three classes. Many of them who are night clerks, working but eight hours, can devote part of the day to some other employment. A letter-carrier goes on duty for more than half the year before daylight. He is required in approaching the office to gather up the letters that have been deposited after the last collection of the preceding day, and to have them at the sub-office to which he reports in time to go to the main office for the earliest mailing. When his day is done, at seven o'clock in the evening, winter or summer, he must go out to his district and make the evening collection, for which he dare not open any box until after half past seven o'clock. Therefore on certain days of the week the letter-carriers are on duty from long before daylight during the winter until ten or eleven o'clock at night. They are also on duty on Sunday. They are originally appointed as substitutes; no original appointments are made. They may wait for months, going on for one, two, or three days' work a week, before they are regularly employed. The substitute is needed in the event of sickness. The regular carrier, though he has worked half a day, should he be stricken down by disease, sun-stroke, accident, loses his whole day's pay; and there is the chance of the substitute, who takes the entire day's pay.

And these carriers must wear a particular uniform. As the Department will not undertake to inspect old clothes, however careful or fortunate a carrier may be in saving his clothes, he must at stated periods pay for another suit though he already has two suits on hand. I know of instances of that kind where the carrier had one suit that he had never worn, and hoped to be relieved from taking another and paying for it; but he was informed that the Department has no system of inspecting clothes, that it must keep the carriers well dressed, and that on the average they require so many suits a year.

Now, I hope that the question of the letter-carriers' pay will be permitted to be discussed legitimately when the post-office bill comes up. This is an attempt adroitly to close that question on an incidental amendment to this bill. What I ask in justice to this ill-paid, over-worked, and profitable class of employés is that the question may have due consideration in the bill in which it should be properly disposed of. This discussion is forced upon us now by the attempt of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to forestall the Post-Office Committee, and to decide in an appropriation bill one of the important features of the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. WRIGHT. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BLOUNT. Cannot the gentleman do it in his own time?

Mr. PAGE. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to go on.

Mr. PAGE. Just one question.

Mr. BLOUNT. There is another gentleman here who wants to ask a question.

Mr. PAGE. I wish to know how much was appropriated in the last Congress for this service.

Mr. BLOUNT. There was appropriated $1,865,000.

Mr. PAGE. In the last Congress?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes.

Mr. PAGE. How much was the estimate for this year?

Mr. BLOUNT. The estimate of the Department was $2,100,000.

Mr. WRIGHT. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question now?

Mr. BLOUNT. Very well.

Mr. WRIGHT. What population is necessary for a town to have the carrier service introduced into it?

Mr. BLOUNT. The law now requires thirty thousand inhabitants. I have taken some pains to make a calculation of the increase in the amount of work done per carrier during the last fiscal year. I was somewhat surprised to find that the actual increase in the pieces handled per carrier in the course of last year was only seventeen; that is, seventeen letters or postal cards or pieces of mail-matter handled by each carrier last year more than the year before. There is not an increase in all the cities everywhere; there was some increase in certain cities.

While other sections of the country were needing service, while they have been denied it for years, this service has been urged forward by the mercantile interest until the Government has announced that in certain large cities the Post-Office Department of the country is actually doing the business of the merchants by carrying information to them six times a day.

Mr. O'NEILL. Well, is not that right?

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me; he will get his own time. I do not think that this kind of facility has been carried to as great an extreme as it should be, considering that other communities are utterly denied the facilities they need. But the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] does not interfere with this letter-carrier service at all. He brings before the House the service in Chicago, and tells what it would be there if he could get an increase of letter-carriers there. Now, it is somewhat singular that, while this service as established by the Post-Office Department is paying in certain cities, it is not paying in Chicago; and this House, on the statement of the postmaster at Chicago that in his opinion an increase of letter-carriers there will make the letter-carrier system a better paying institution, is asked to increase the appropriations in this bill all along the line. The gentleman from Illinois proposes to add over $100,000; $130,000 I think; and the only ground he puts it upon is the opinion of the postmaster at Chicago that, if this increase be made, the carrier system in that city will begin to pay something.

It will be utterly useless for the Committee on Appropriations to attempt to keep down expenditures, if these appropriations are to be increased, and increased in this direction. These extraordinary facilities are denied to the whole country, excepting eighty-seven cities which receive the exclusive benefit of this system.

Mr. BANKS. The proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is susceptible of division. The first branch proposes to increase the amount of the appropriation, which I think ought to be done. The second contemplates a change in the compensation of letter-carriers from what the law now authorizes. The pay of letter-carriers has been reduced by the Postmaster-General below the sum the law allows him to pay them on account of the diminished appropriations of last year. He had to reduce salaries or diminish the number of carriers and he chose, properly I think, to reduce salaries. This is in effect an evasion of the existing law caused by insufficient appropriations which ought not now to be sustained by the Committee of the Whole. What the committee should do, in my judgment, is to increase the amount of the appropriation, leaving the law as to the compensation of letter-carriers to remain as it now stands. At a proper time I will move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois by striking out the second clause of the proposition so that the carriers shall continue to receive the pay now authorized by law to which they are richly entitled, and the increased appropriation provided in the first clause will enable the Postmaster-General to pay them in accordance with the existing provisions of the statute. It will also enable him to extend the delivery of letters to many cities and towns in different parts of the country. It was never intended that the system should be restricted to those communities whose business would defray all expenses of delivery. It stands upon the same basis as the general Post-Office establishment. If there is an excess of receipts over expenses in one place it is applied to maintain the delivery of letters in others where the expenses must at first necessarily exceed the receipts, and thus it will be gradually extended until all populous communities are accommodated in every part of the country.

Mr. Chairman, the letter-carrier system thus becomes a constantly-increasing public benefit. Many gentlemen here probably fail to comprehend the great advantages and the vast saving to the Government that are secured by it. In the district which I represent if the letter-carrier system were discontinued the Government would be obliged in some instances to commence immediately the construction of large buildings for the accommodation of those who would be compelled to come to the post-office for their letters. The employment of letter-carriers obviates this necessity and saves the Government from this expense, and also from that attending a largely increased clerical service, which would be indispensable, especially in manufacturing towns or cities where the delivery of letters would occur in the evening or at the close of the day's labor. The free delivery avoids both of these demands upon the Treasury and pays its own expenses at the same time.

As to the pay of the letter-carriers, one class, according to the contemplation of the law, ought to receive $800 annually; and another class, for diligence and effective service, may receive $1,000 per annum, if the Postmaster-General thinks them entitled to it. No men in the country are worked like these letter-carriers. I have had occasion to notice them again and again with admiration and astonishment. I am myself a good walker, having been accustomed to travel on foot all my life; but I have never yet seen men in civil or in military life who could march like one of these letter-carriers. He moves with a stride like an ostrich, his head forward, his eyes upon the ground, as if some important event was staked upon his covering the lean earth in a given time. His mind, energy, and capacity seem to be absorbed in the discharge of his duties. The letter-carrier is notoriously a silent man. You cannot get an unnecessary word out of him. I know that it may be difficult for a member of the House of Representatives to conceive that any man could be indisposed to talk, and still less to be wholly silent; but look at the first letter-carrier you meet on the street; see him as he speeds on his way; try to engage him in conversation, and you will find that he is too much devoted to his business to utter one superfluous word.

The integrity with which they discharge their obligations to the Government is worthy of notice, especially in these later days. There is nothing in the reports of the Department nor in the public journals of failure in the delivery of letters. Nothing would be more certain of notice and complaint than such a default. It does not occur. How much anxious care it requires to deliver each letter and to find a correspondent, resident, or visitor in the out-of-the-way places of cities and town, no one can know who has not made an experiment. And yet it is done—done with such success as to silence grumblers and satisfy our citizens and their Government.

The letter-carrier is obliged to clothe himself in the uniform prescribed by the Government; and, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania says, to provide for stress of weather or other accident he must have an extra suit in addition to the clothing of ordinary life which is indispensable when he is off duty. Thus he is subjected to a very considerable expense beyond that imposed upon other men employed in the civil service of the Government, which he is illy able to bear, and which ought not in justice to be put upon him. It is for the efficiency of the service and the security of the Government, not out of any vanity, caprice, or pride of his own that he is uniformed and he ought not to be saddled with its cost. At least he ought not to suffer an enforced reduction of salary in addition to the cost of uniform beyond what the law authorizes and contemplates on account of insufficient annual appropriations.

The letter-carriers are generally married men with families, and the salaries contemplated by law, which they do not now receive, are barely sufficient for their support. There is no "skilled labor" more arduous than theirs. Whenever they are unable to perform their duties they are required to supply and pay acceptable substitutes; they are allowed no "vacations" such as most other persons enjoy in public and private service. Their offices call for the performance of some official duty nearly every day in the year, not excepting Sundays. An act of Congress has signalized the importance of the duties of these officers by requiring sureties and bonds for their faithful performance.

The reduction of the appropriation last year, contrary to the advice of the Department, necessitated in the first place a reduction in the number of these letter-carriers and in the number of the post-offices to which they are attached. It also compelled the Postmaster-General to reduce the pay of the carriers below what the law contemplates. The statute provides for a salary of $800 for one class and $1,000 for another. The reduction of the appropriation compelled the Postmaster-General to despoil these men of what the law intended should be paid them, and what they eminently deserve.

I hope the Committee of the Whole will amend this proposition of the gentleman from Illinois so as to provide that the salaries shall be paid as now authorized by law, and that the appropriation shall be increased, as proposed, to $2,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, the increased work and the reduced pay of the letter-carriers during the last year, according to the statement of the Postmaster-General, reduced the expenses and increased the receipts to the amount of nearly $361,000. This is the amount which the Government has saved by taking from them what the law contemplated they should receive and by putting on them more work than the law contemplated they should perform. Now, when the bill that is to be reported by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads shall come up, we can consider the matter of compensation more fully; but let us increase the amount of this appropriation to $2,000,000, as now proposed.

Mr. DURHAM. I desire to say only a word. The question is not now upon an increase or a decrease of the compensation of letter-carriers. The question, as I understand, is upon the increase of this appropriation and the enlargement of the number of carriers. As to the increase or decrease of compensation for carriers I have not a word to say; but in respect to the proposed increase of the amount of appropriation I wish to say something. I admit that the cities having these letter-carriers are by reason of the vast amount of business done there entitled to some consideration; but gentlemen representing the cities ought to bear in mind that there is a vast country outside of the cities and that there are many places throughout the length and breadth of the land where they get but one mail a week, and where they have to ride eight and ten and fifteen miles for it.

It will be said by having these letter-carriers it will increase the amount of revenue to be derived by the Post-Office Department, but I apprehend there are but few gentlemen upon this floor who will advocate that the post-office system of the United States ought to be self-sustaining. I agree with my venerable friend from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] this country is large, that intelligence ought to be distributed everywhere, and that the people ought to have their mail twice a week where now they only succeed in obtaining it once. By this appropriation you propose to carry intelligence to the doors of certain cities six times a day when there are many portions of the country where, as I have already stated, they do not get it but once a week.

I am opposed to this increase, and while I am not permitted to say what occurred in committee, I can state that while I support this appropriation coming from the Committee on Appropriations for $1,800,000, nevertheless I must insist that amount shall not be increased, and that whatever increase may take place here shall be in the line of the argument advanced by my worthy friend the other day, and that is for the benefit of those portions of the country where they do not get intelligence but once a week.

I do not intend to say a word, as I have already said, about the compensation of these men. They may be working very cheaply; they may be overpaid, as has been said by one gentleman, but what I do insist upon is that you must keep down the compensation to letter-carriers and the amount appropriated therefor to a reasonable sum in order to give proper appropriation to what is called the star-route service, so the whole country may participate somewhat equally in the boon which the Government bestows in the dissemination of intelligence.

Mr. BANNING. Will the gentleman yield to me to ask him whether we have not taken good care of the star routes?

Mr. DURHAM. Yes, sir, tolerably good care, and that has been because we had a star-route committee, and we would do even a little better if we could. As I remarked awhile ago I cannot see why gentlemen in cities should want intelligence brought to their doors six times a day or three times a day when they do not have to walk a hundred yards for their mail.

Mr. FRANKLIN. The cities pay for it.

Mr. DURHAM. And we ought to have other things in the country that we do not have and for which we pay.

Mr. FRANKLIN. We are now talking about the postal business.

Mr. DURHAM. I am talking about the postal business too, and I say you must keep these appropriations within proper bounds. The $1,840,000 appropriated is, in my judgment, rather in excess of what ought to be given for this purpose than below it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLOUNT. I move the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I hope I will be allowed five minutes before debate is closed.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 89, noes 20.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BLACKBURN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MILLS reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration a bill (H. R. No. 4246) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move, Mr. Speaker, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the post-office appropriation bill, and pending that motion I move all debate on the pending paragraph and the amendments thereto be closed in one minute.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I move to amend by saying twenty minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question will first be taken on the amendment, as, under the rules, it includes the longest time.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 25, noes 66.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I raise the question that no quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. BLOUNT, and Mr. CANNON of Illinois.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 57, noes 98. So the motion was disagreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to make it ten minutes.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 25, noes 79.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I raise the question that no quorum has voted.

Mr. BANNING. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will yield to ten minutes.

Mr. EDEN. I object to debate.

Mr. SPRINGER. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. FRANKLIN. I renew it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. SPRINGER and Mr. BLOUNT.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 54, noes 94. So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I now move to make it five minutes.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am willing to agree to that as a modification of my motion.

The motion, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. BLOUNT. I now move the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. MILLS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House, debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto is limited to five minutes.

Mr. BANKS. I withdraw my formal amendment.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I move pro forma to strike out the last word.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a word in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLY,] who appears to think I have anticipated the action of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads in my amendment. I do not agree to the bill reported by that committee and on the Calendar and will antagonize it when it comes up for consideration. I doubt if it is reached this session, but, believing that the force of letter-carriers should be slightly increased without an increase of salary, this was the proper time to present the amendment now pending.

Now a word in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] who speaks of extraordinary use of legs by the letter-carriers, and their onerous duties. I take it for granted that his great familiarity with this onerous service must be from his personal observation in the letter-carrier city in his district, namely, the city of Lynn, Massachusetts, which I find from the Postmaster-General's report has seven carriers in the service at the annual compensation of $794.48 each, aggregating $5,561.38. I find further that the total local postage on all the matter carried by these hard-worked, leg-worn seven carriers at $794.48 each is $1,791 per annum, or $256 per carrier. That is, the Government pays these seven leg-weary men $5,561.38 to earn $1,791 in local postages, no more and no less. Oh, how we should be swift to heap more pay upon the gentleman's hard-worked constituent letter-carriers.

Mr. BANKS. If you will give us $150,000 for a post-office we will dispense with the carrier service.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. There are a great many other small cities besides Lynn where the letter-carrier service should be dispensed with and where the credit and debit sides of the ledger growing out of this service do not show much better than Lynn, but no sooner do you mention the matter of abolishing or not increasing the pay of their unnecessary carriers than gentlemen who represent these small cities rise to protest; and to hear gentlemen talk one is filled with astonishment that persons can be found to perform the Herculean labor for the alleged small pittance of pay.

Mr. HANNA. I wish to say to the gentleman—

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I am not speaking about the gentleman's city of Indianapolis. It has over seventy-five thousand inhabitants, and needs the letter-carrier service. I wonder at the desire of many gentlemen to increase these salaries when it is recollected that their pay is more than skilled mechanics receive now in the United States, many of whom have difficulty to get constant employment; especially do I wonder at the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who has much to say from time to time about the hard times and the thousands of men out of employment, suffering for bread, but who in the next breath proposes to tax these same poverty-stricken men, while the wolf is at the door, to increase the salaries of men whose places they would gladly take at less pay. Sir, I have no desire to pay anybody an inadequate salary. I think the Government should pay every cent a service is worth, and I believe such payment is now being made for this service, but the truth is, thousands of perfectly competent, honest men would be glad to do this service for less than the salaries now received.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. There are many men who would do the work of the gentleman from Illinois for one-fifth of what he does it for.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. That argument would apply to my venerable friend from New York as well as to me.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time allowed for debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto has expired. The Clerk will report the pending amendment, which is that of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "carriers," in the one hundred and twenty-second line, including "dollars" on the one hundred and twenty-third line, and insert as follows:

Two million dollars: Provided, Letter-carriers of the different classes shall each be paid a larger salary than they now receive.

Mr. BANKS. I ask for a division of the two branches of the amendment.

The question was first taken on the first portion of the amendment, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "carriers" and insert "$2,000,000."

The question being taken, there were—ayes 49, noes 71.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

The question being taken on the second part of the amendment it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For wrapping paper, $20,000.
For wrapping twine, $45,000.
For marking and rating stamps, $12,000.
For letter balances and scales, $3,500.
For rent, light, and fuel, $380,000.
For office furniture, $15,000.
For stationery, $50,000.
For miscellaneous and incidental items, $80,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask that by unanimous consent the clauses from line 120 to line 134 be transposed so as to be inserted in the bill after line 84. The object is that this part of the bill may be placed under the office of the First Assistant Postmaster-General, where it properly belongs, instead of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. WARD. I offer the following amendment:

In line 133 strike out "$80,000" and insert "$100,000;" so that it will read:
For miscellaneous and incidental items, $100,000.

I offer this amendment for the purpose of giving the Post-Office Department some lee-way in this matter. I would give the Department discretion in several matters, and will withdraw my amendment after making the remarks I endeavored to offer while the previous section was under discussion. I would give the Department some discretion in the direction of letter-carriers and the regulating of their salaries and their assignment to duty and the places within whose sphere their duties should be exercised. I believe as a class they are not paid an amount equivalent to the character of the men employed, the qualifications they require, and the services they perform. I believe there is no class of men as intelligent, as well disciplined, as courteous, who are required to perform such responsible duties, and suffer the exposure in all weathers during the long hours, providing at their own expense a prescribed uniform, that are paid anything like the low wages they receive. Fair wages to the men who do the work is both simple justice and wise legislation. And while upon that subject I desire to say in reply to the remarks of the able and very careful gentleman of the Post-Office Committee from the State of Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that the remedy he proposes does not effect the cure, nor is the complaint he makes legitimate to the subject. If any defect exists in the letter-carrier system by reason of men being employed in cities that do not pay, that is no argument why the men that are employed now and are performing their duties faithfully should have their wages reduced and should not be paid living salaries. The remedy should be rather in having the system regulated so that it shall be in force in places where it comes near being self-sustaining. There is no reason why in any city where the letter-carrier's service is required or is convenient for the public business it cannot be made very nearly self-sustaining.

I have in my eye small cities where this service would be legitimately performed, and with benefit to the public, and where the appropriation of a small proportion of the net revenues of the particular post-office could be applied to this fund, and the public convenience increased without detriment to the postal system or any drain upon the Treasury.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HANNA. I have no desire to speak upon this question, but I rise to ask the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] who has charge of this bill, to explain what items this appropriation covers. The items which come under the head of miscellaneous or incidental expenses. I see by the estimates of the Post-Office Department that they ask $140,000 for this purpose, while the committee report an appropriation of $80,000. I do not desire to consume the time of the committee, but I would like to know what items are included under that appropriation.

Mr. BLOUNT. It covers many items, such as furniture, for instance, and carpets. I will say further that but $60,000 was spent under this item last year; but of course the larger the appropriation is that we make the more they will spend.

Mr. HANNA. May I ask the gentleman if the Post-Office Department furnished the committee with a statement of the various items and the character of the expenses that would be covered by this appropriation?

Mr. BLOUNT. Nothing more than the general statement that I have given. As I have said, this will be sufficient for the purpose for which it is designed; but if you give them more of course they will spend more.

Mr. HANNA. Is it to be used in making the Post-Office Department service more effective?

Mr. BLOUNT. No, sir.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I move to strike out the last word and yield my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WARD.]

Mr. WARD. There are one or two other points in connection with this matter to which I wish to refer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] made the point of order a few minutes ago that under the rules of the House there could be only five minute's debate upon each side upon any amendment. That has not been the custom of the House, but it is the rule, and the gentleman cannot speak ten minutes on the same side of a proposition. The attention of the Chair having been called to the rule, he must enforce it.

Mr. WARD. Then I will speak for five minutes against the amendment. I simply want to occupy the floor for a minute or two for the purpose of correcting what I think is an error, and an error which I am sure no one in this committee who understands the matter would wish to have made.

The Post-Office Department has been charged here with having indirectly increased the expenses of transportation by railways, and from a table I have prepared I find that the cost of mail transportation by these routes has not increased proportionately between the years 1860 and 1873 in view of the compensation paid under the act of 1873 compared with the rates paid in 1860. If the same remuneration were now paid the cost would be much more, and I will publish a table as a part of my remarks, showing the figures.

The following leading railroads were being paid in 1860 for 18,500 pounds per mile per annum, at the rate of $375 per mile per annum, and are now the main roads which are being paid over $375 per mile:

Railroads.	Present weight in pounds.	Present pay in weight.	Pay would be now in same proportion.
United railways of New Jersey.....	69,554	$905	$1,308
Pennsylvania Railroad.....	48,547	669	1,032
Lake Shore Railroad.....	37,385	533	750
New York Central Railroad.....	38,870	538	770
New York and New Haven Railroad.....	36,502	533	730
Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, and Saint Louis Railroad.....	29,913	459	568
Philadelphia, Wilmington, and Baltimore Railroad.....	25,000	433	500
Boston and Albany Railroad.....	24,849	403	502

I allude to this fact for the reason that my district is a sufferer from a misunderstanding between the Department and the railroad companies. In such a case it is not the Department or the railway company that suffers, but the people through whose territory the route runs. In my own district the mail service is deranged now, and it is a large and populous district, where the postal revenues are large, and large business and manufacturing interests depend upon regularity and certainty in mails, which is put to inconvenience by this misunderstanding between the Department and the railroad companies. It can do no good to have misunderstandings and mistaken notions in the true rate of compensation or on any other points involved in the discussion, and therefore I give these statistics. I now withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For compensation to railway post-office clerks, $1,275,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I offer an amendment to strike out in line 148 "$1,275,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$1,300,000."

I offer this amendment because I understand that the mail-service division of the Post-Office Department desires $25,000 upon this item and $6,000 upon the following clause, and that their estimate is that these amounts are the very smallest sum upon which this service can be properly conducted. I have no desire to carp at or to criticize the work of the Committee on Appropriations. I know that the reduction of expenditures is at best an ungracious task; that wherever expenditures are reduced somebody is struck, and where a man's personal interests are involved it is hard to reason with him. But when the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] was speaking of the hardships and of the low pay of these letter-carriers, who perform their duties at their homes and enjoy the usual comforts of home, I could not but reflect that these postal clerks and route agents, who are obliged to perform their duties on long lines of railroad, subject continually to the dangers of the road, required to be at their places hours before starting on the train, and perhaps arriving at their destination long past midnight, obliged to make their reports at offices far away from the station, and after an hour or two's sleep compelled to start on the return trip, and keep this up day after day and night after night through the entire week, is and must be most exhausting. Add to this the jar and motion of the car, a constant sense of danger and the most extreme tension on brain and muscle, is it any wonder that on an average of four years their health breaks down and many of them become physical wrecks? They are also denied the society of their families and nearly all social privileges, and as a reward for faithful service like this, a few years ago, those who had been receiving $1,400 were cut down to $1,300 per year, and those who were receiving $1,200 were cut down to $1,150 per year, while route agents were reduced to $900 and mail messengers to less than $600, while the distance run and the services performed were from 25 to 50 per cent. greater than the railroad companies required of the train men on the same cars.

This is the way the United States Government appreciates and rewards faithful service.

In the last three years the appropriation for this service, according to authentic statements which I hold in my hand, has not been increased on an average more than $1,000, while the length of routes has been increased 15 per cent. per annum, and the amount of mail matter handled upon the trains has been increased also 15 per cent.; an increase of 30 per cent. in all in distance and labor; and from 1876 to 1877 the increase was 11 per cent. in a single year. Notwithstanding all this, the increased appropriation is not asked with a view of increasing the salaries of these men, but of relieving them of some of this hard service. The Department has been obliged to transfer and place on new routes these employes who are obliged to learn daily the changes in the schedules and constantly shifting time-tables, and thus they are taxed physically and mentally to the utmost tension of their powers. No drudge or cart-horse is worked more mercilessly than they, and they are rewarded by the reduction of their salaries and by the cutting off of "helpers," which the Department has been compelled to do because of the smallness of the appropriation. The following is an authentic statement which I will make a part of my remarks:

The expenditures for railway postal clerks for 1876, 1877, and for the present fiscal year, 1878, is about the same, the variation between the different years not being $1,000.

During these three years the miles of annual service performed by railway post-office clerks has increased not less than 15 per cent., the increase in 1877 over 1876 being over 11 per cent.

The amount of work performed on the trains, as shown by the actual weight of mails and by the statements made of work done in railway post-office cars by railway post-office clerks, has increased at least 15 per cent.

From actual weighings taken to fix the compensation of the route, the daily average weight of mail going over the roads leading from New York to the West and Southwest show that the daily average for February, 1877, was 108,000 pounds; for March, 1878, 124,000 pounds. During March, 1878, there were no official supplies moving, as there was in February, 1877.

This mail must be distributed while in transit, else there will be a delay, as is well understood.

The increase of mail distributed on the New York and Chicago Railway post-office is as follows: September, 1877, 34,261 sacks of papers and 226,594 packages of letters; January, 1878, 42,636 sacks of papers and 284,059 packages of letters; an increase of about 8,000 sacks of papers and nearly 60,000 packages of letters in four months.

In the New York and Pittsburgh division of the New York, Cincinnati and Saint Louis Railway post-office there were 88,041 sacks of papers distributed in February, 1878, against 54,086 sacks distributed in March, 1877, and 49,188 packages of letters distributed in February, 1878, against 25,362 packages of letters distributed in March, 1877.

The technical duty of a railway post-office clerk is to distribute the through work of route agents, and mail-route messengers to do the local work. Practically, however, the Department requires railway post-office clerks to do all work on the line, local and through, and route agents and mail-route messengers to do the same, or in other words each employe is required to do all the work that may be on his line. It has been the custom of the Department wherever railway post-office service was placed upon a line to take from that line all route agents and to instruct the railway post-office clerks to perform the local distribution in addition to their technical duty. In this way the route agent fund has always been relieved at the expense of the railway post-office fund. There having been no increase for the last two years in the railway post-office fund, the Department has been unable to do this, and the consequence is that the route agents have been retained on all the new railway post-office lines. Instead of the route agents' fund being diverted to the use of the railway post-office fund, the railway post-office fund has been diverted to the route agents. However, this is merely technical, there being practically no distinction whatever in the work performed.

Wherever there is a large amount of through distribution the line is at once made a railway post-office line if there are funds to do so. There is imperatively demanded for the proper performance of the work the establishment of a new railway post-office line from Saint Louis, Missouri, leading to the North and West, and one from Saint Louis leading to the Southwest in order that the distribution of the mails accumulating at Saint Louis for the sections supplied by these lines may be distributed before reaching the diverging points. Without some increase in the appropriation it will be impossible to do this.

The only details that have been made that were not made in the way above mentioned were in cases of relief route agents; in other words, where the run was considered too arduous for the agents upon any line, we had for several lines one agent who one day in four, five, or six would relieve the regular agent, giving him a short breathing spell. This has been discontinued and these relief agents ordered to duty on regular lines. The mail-route messengers' fund is one which requires particular attention.

Mail-route messengers are run upon short routes where there is but one agent or one messenger, or where one cannot make the round trip each day two who are on duty all the time, the length of the route determining the pay they receive, which is in all cases less than $900 and averages perhaps $600 per annum. This is the only distinction between mail-route messengers and route agents, route agents receiving $900 and over and mail-route messengers less than $900. When the reductions in the appropriations were made the appropriation for mail-route messengers was reduced equally with the appropriation for route agents. The reduction necessitated a decrease in the pay; the consequence was that the reduction in route agents' pay threw a large number below $900, decreasing the demand on the route agents' fund, but increasing the demand on the mail-route messengers' fund. The Department has therefore been unable to maintain service on many of the shorter lines upon which there has been service in the past, and almost absolutely unable to put service upon new lines as they are built.

The expenditure for the first six months of the present fiscal year was nearly $4,000 more than half of the appropriation for mail-route messengers. For the next succeeding three months, or the first quarter of 1878, the third quarter of the fiscal year, it was very nearly $3,000 more than one-quarter of the appropriation, making a surplus expenditure for mail-route messengers for the first three quarters of the present fiscal year of about $7,000 more than three quarters of the appropriation. At the extra session of Congress $10,000 were appropriated for employes on railroads. This fund has been, therefore, almost entirely appropriated to making good the deficiency in the appropriation for mail-route messenger service. There are at present roads upon which there should be service that will require an expenditure of at least $8,000 for mail-route messengers. The increase in the extension of railroads and the completion of new ones is, as all well know, large; and consequently it is absolutely impossible to do more than maintain the present number of mail-route messengers unless the appropriation is increased to the amount asked for by the Department.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman complains that by reason of the smallness of the appropriation—

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Excuse me; I did not complain; I simply stated the fact.

Mr. BLOUNT. Well, the argument of the gentleman, if he prefers that, is that by reason of the failure of Congress to appropriate enough for postal-car clerks there has been a withdrawal from other lines of mail-route messengers, route agents, &c. The gentleman has stated the absolute truth. The superintendent of railroad mail transportation has directed all his energies toward perfecting the postal-car system and the improvement of it on the great trunk lines, and distressing the remainder of the country for want of service. In his own statement he says that he has taken fifty messengers and put them on these great lines as clerks.

Now the trouble is not in this House, it is not in the character of our legislation, but it is in disregard of legislation by the officers in charge of this service in pandering to the fancies of those officers. What have we done? We have added to this appropriation the sum of $50,000. Now let the officer in charge confine himself to the purpose of Congress; let him restore these route messengers and agents back to their lines; let the mail messengers go back to their lines. We have provided an increase for route agents, and an increase of about 15 per cent. for the mail-route messengers on these newly constructed lines.

Yet all this is brought into the simple question of postal-car service, for the purpose of arraying gentlemen from sections away from the lines of these great railroads to make a contest for the fast-mail service.

I hope this House will not entertain the amendment, but that the officer in charge of this service will be made to understand by some means or other, he and some of the other officials, that it is his duty to follow legislation and not to dictate it. It is high time that these little subordinate officials were made to understand that they cannot dominate in this land and dictate the character of this service in defiance of legislation.

Mr. DANFORD. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of saying a word in favor of this postal-car system that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] attacks so fiercely. I believe that the postal-car clerks are paid a reasonable compensation, but I favor an increase of that service. I believe that when the superintendent of that service withdraws route agents and places them upon postal cars as clerks he is acting for the best interest of the mail service of the country.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is he conforming to law in doing so?

Mr. DANFORD. Conforming to law? There is no law that he is violating in doing that. The gentleman complains that he is not following the line of appropriations here. In my judgment he is following in that matter the line of policy that gives to the country the best service with the money that Congress appropriates.

For instance, take the country west of the Ohio River. The great mails are made up in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore. Under the old system those mails were sent through in charge of route agents and were dumped down in mass into the general distributing office for Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, and thereby twenty-four hours at least were lost in the delivery of every mail in the States of the West and the South.

Take the lines that run through the State of Ohio, the Pennsylvania road and the Baltimore and Ohio road, those lines that I know more about than the others. There are postal cars run on those railroad lines. A letter or a paper mailed in Washington or in Baltimore this evening will reach any post-office along the line of those roads west of the Ohio River to-morrow morning. Under the old system the mails would be sent to the distributing office in the city of Wheeling, for instance, if there was intelligence enough in the clerks here in Washington and Baltimore to send it to the proper distributing office, and it would lose twenty-four hours in delivery along the line of that road; and possibly it might be sent to Columbus, Cleveland, or Cincinnati, to be returned to us twenty-four hours later. That is the system to which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] wants the superintendent of this service to return.

It is not only the post-offices along the lines of those roads that thus receive the advantage of twenty-four hours in the delivery of the mail, but every post-office on the cross-routes that run down into the country receive their mails twenty-four hours earlier. I believe that the system pursued by the superintendent of this service is the one that gives to the West and the South its mails at least twenty-four hours in advance of the old route-agent system. And it is for the purpose of adding to that system, giving us more postal-car clerks, that I advocate the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

Mr. PHILLIPS. I believe the gentleman who has this bill in charge complained some time ago when this same subject was under discussion, as he did to-day, of the concentration of postal clerks on these fast lines; that the Department had unduly multiplied the number of these clerks. Now, sir, what are the facts? From New York City alone some sixty tons of mail matter are sent every day. A part of these is for the Northwest, another part for the South. Different portions of this mail matter go out on different lines. This mail matter, instead of being sent out on one train, as the gentleman from Georgia would seem to desire, is sent out on the trains going in the particular direction of its destination. On every train this mail matter is carefully distributed while the train is going. I believe I am correct in stating that in the State of Georgia every railway line has its mail service and its postal clerks on every express or passenger train going through the State.

The gentleman from Georgia wishes to reduce the number of postal clerks on these railway cars because the clerks have been concentrated on the fast lines. Does he wish to destroy those fast lines? Does he desire that they should be crippled? Does he wish to weaken the efforts of the Postmaster-General so that the mails from the great business centers of the country shall be delayed one or two days? Is the small amount which the gentleman proposes to save in this bill worth saving, if it entails such inconvenience? Does not the business of the country require the maintenance of this system? I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin will prevail. I only wish he had proposed twice the amount that his amendment names.

The pending pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I renew the pro forma amendment. Mr. Chairman, I believe that no service provided for by our appropriations so greatly helps and benefits every class of people throughout this country as the postal service, unless it be the improvement of rivers and harbors. During the last week we have heard considerable said about the improvement of the small rivers in the country. Upon that I wish to make one single remark: every stream which by an appropriation of twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars can be made navigable, placing it for the purposes of transportation by the side of the railroads of the country, enables the farmer in that section of the country, whether North or South, East or West, to get five cents a bushel more for his wheat. I know this to be a fact. Such appropriations do more toward paying the taxes of the people and putting money into their pockets than any appropriations made by Congress, unless it be those which we make for maintaining the postal service.

Now, in regard to the amendment of my colleague from Wisconsin, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] it is an actual fact that in the West, ever since the 1st day of last July, so far as my knowledge goes, three postal clerks have had to do the work of four. In one case in my district a postal clerk has received, as I am informed, an injury of the spine, permanent in its character, because of the unceasing labor which he has had to perform on one of these lines.

Why should we hesitate upon an appropriation of $25,000 for an important arm of our postal service, when there is reason to believe that by this appropriation we shall increase the efficiency of that service and enable these clerks, by allowing them proper rest, to do their labor well? I believe that if the Committee on Appropriations would assent to this extra appropriation of $25,000 the country would be benefited. We should not upon so small an amount run the risk of impairing the efficiency of this important arm of the postal service.

Mr. CLYMER. The Committee on Appropriations want to do what is right; they do not want to cripple the service. The amount expended last year for railway postal clerks was $1,223,000. We now propose to appropriate $50,000 additional. If the service was well performed last year for $1,223,000, I put it to the fair judgment of any member whether it is likely that in the present condition of the country the Post-Office Department will need a greater increase for this service than $50,000.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I move pro forma to amend the amendment by striking out the last two words. I do this not for the purpose of advocating an increase of the appropriation for this service but in order to answer one or two statements made by the gentleman from Georgia which I think reflect improperly and without sufficient foundation upon the superintendent of the railway mail service. The statute provides that there shall be route agents appointed by the Postmaster-General to convey the mails and that there shall also be postal clerks appointed to distribute the mails.

Now the object in having these postal clerks was that they should distribute the mails upon the trains while in transit, thereby doing away with the necessity for having this work done in the post-offices. The law did not contemplate in the first instance that these men should take care of the local mails passing along the different lines. Hence when the gentleman from Georgia speaks of the illegal diversion of route agents to this postal railway service I think he does an injustice to the superintendent of railway mail service, who, in my opinion, is a vigilant officer. I read from the report to which the gentleman has referred, "at present there are fifty route agents detailed for duty in the railway postal cars to perform the local work"—just such work as the statute contemplated they should perform.

He suggests to Congress the propriety of increasing slightly the number of railway post-office clerks, so while they do this great through-distribution work they may at the same time do the local work, and thereby the few route agents who have been detailed to do this local work may be sent back to other smaller lines. There is therefore no violation of law, there is no improper action on the part of this superintendent in this respect. I take it the gentleman from Georgia perhaps has not given that close, careful attention he ought to have given it before he made this wholesale, sweeping attack upon this officer for the manner in which he has performed his duties.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLOUNT. Gentlemen seem to want a vote on the pending amendment, and if there be no objection I hope debate will be closed. Otherwise I will move the committee rise for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and debate is closed.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I withdraw the pending formal amendment.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 54, noes 73. So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I offer the following amendment:

Add to the end of line 149:

Provided, That postal clerks, route agents, and mail-route messengers shall not be required to wear uniforms."

Mr. BLOUNT. Before the gentleman from Ohio proceeds I merely wish to say in relation to this matter, we have no information from the Department; and, as I understand from the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, it is not objectionable, I will not make the point of order to which the amendment is liable.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I will make this statement in reference to the amendment: I appreciate highly, indeed, the postal-car service. I believe we have the best example of a real, genuine civil service in our railway postal service. The examinations relate to the efficiency of the men employed. It has thereby been brought to a high degree of efficiency. But I think in the desire of the Department to make this work thorough they have gone one step too far. I learn they have prescribed a cloth uniform to be worn by these officers, which in some portions of the country, indeed in all portions of the country in summer, would be burdensome to wear and expensive as well. These postal clerks are mostly employed in the postal cars, and do most of their work wholly shut up in the railway car, and to require them to wear a uniform would not only be expensive but sometimes inconvenient and burdensome. Furthermore, the train men on all lines of railroad wear a uniform of blue cloth, like the uniform proposed for these postal-car clerks. Even the pea-nut boys wear a uniform scarcely distinguishable from it. It is like the uniform of the police in most of our cities, and so far from being a protection from interference with the mails, I am not at all sure but it would rather make it easier for those who wish to steal to take advantage of some of the various uniforms and slip in and get a mail-bag without detection and carry it off. I believe the adoption of my proviso would be regarded generally as a good thing.

Mr. WADDELL. Let me make a suggestion.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is no objection in the world to authorizing and directing a badge to be worn, a cap, or something that is specially distinguishing, but to require a uniform throughout is, I think, too much.

Mr. WADDELL. I concur entirely in the motion made by the gentleman from Ohio, but I submit to him and to this committee whether it would not be better to so modify the amendment as to require that no employé of the Post-Office Department, letter-carrier, post clerk, or other, should wear any uniform or anything beyond a special cap or some distinguishing badge.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would object to that so far as letter-carriers are concerned. It may be where persons are intrusted with the duty of carrying mails about the streets, going and unlocking mail-boxes in our cities, they should wear some distinguishing uniform.

Mr. SPARKS. Is not a cap sufficient?

Mr. GARFIELD. Perhaps it might be.

Mr. BANKS. The uniform required is not for any mere personal gratification of the letter-carrier or the vanity of the Government, but it is a measure of security. In every place where these officers are required to perform their duty there are numerous persons who are liable to, and on the least opportunity being afforded to them may and do, commit robberies; and if there is any position where there should be a distinction between one class of men and another, between those who have a right to be in the postal cars and those who have not, it is in such a case as this, a distinction that should be patent to everybody, like the uniform required of those engaged in the mail service. Every government has been compelled to adopt it. It would in my judgment be a great mistake, a misfortune, if the present provision of law should be repealed and the practice discontinued. When it was first proposed that this uniform should be worn I entertained the same views of the subject now expressed by the gentleman from Ohio. But I have since discovered from my own experience and from observation on the part of our own and other governments it is an indispensable precaution and security to individuals and the public. There must be some distinctive mark worn by these officers, who go everywhere on duty at all times of the day and night, and there is nothing for this purpose so effective, tasteful, and proper as a modest, durable, and inexpensive uniform. So imperative is this necessity that it has been found requisite to apply it to the attendants on street-cars in nearly all cities and towns of the country. There is nothing otherwise to prevent any person going into a street-car and collecting the fares from passengers unless the proper officers for this duty are distinguished by some designation or mark, and nothing is so effective and so pleasant and proper as an appropriately designed uniform. A badge or cap is not sufficient for that purpose. It can be easily and instantly changed. The clothing is a distinctive mark, and the assumption of such clothing would be an offense if not a crime on the part of any one not authorized who should assume to wear it.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment by adding the words "other than a cap or badge."

I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that there is very great propriety in having the letter-carriers wear a complete uniform, so that you can distinguish one of them as far as you can see; because they are upon duty when they come in contact with the general public, and persons professing to be letter-carriers might do great injury if there was no way to distinguish them. It is also important that local agents have a uniform; those are the agents who take the mail from the cars to the post-office. But there in my opinion the necessity for a uniform ceases.

Let us inquire for a moment what the duty of these postal clerks and route agents is. It is to go inside of a car, close the door, and distribute the mails with closed doors; and it is contrary to the regulations to let any other person whatever come into that car. The public does not have access to it; and if a postal clerk or route agent was to come in contact with the public in the performance of his duties anywhere, then he would be discharged under the regulations of the Department.

Where, then, is the necessity for the uniform? What is the use, with a view to the protection of the public, of his putting on a uniform when he is shut up out of sight of the public? When my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] sees a postal clerk or a route agent he is not on duty at all. He has not the power to touch the mails in any respect whatever; and when he goes on duty then the eyes of my friend from Massachusetts are not good enough to see through the wooden doors where he is distributing the mail.

I am of opinion that the railway-mail service in the main is an admirable one; and while no doubt the Postmaster-General believed it was for the interest of the service to uniform these employés, I am satisfied that it entails an unnecessary expense upon a hard-worked and by no means overpaid class of employés. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MCCOOK. I have no disposition to discuss this amendment at all. But if, as I understand to be the case, the uniform of our Army and our Navy is prescribed by regulation in the respective Departments, and not by positive enactment by Congress, it appears to me it is dignifying this matter a great deal too much to legislate in regard to it. If we do it at all it appears to me there should be a uniform law prescribing the uniform for every class of the public servants.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, to the amendment of Mr. GARFIELD, it was agreed to.

The question being taken on Mr. GARFIELD's amendment as amended, there were—ayes 54, noes 18.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For route agents, $1,020,000.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I move to amend by striking out "$1,020,000" and inserting "$1,045,000."

I desire to say a word in reference to that amendment. It will be recollected that when the general discussion on this bill was going on, I took occasion to say that with the exception of two or three minor matters I believed the bill was right. This was one item in regard to which I stated that in my judgment it ought to be increased by the amount of $25,000. The next item for mail-route messengers I think should be increased by the amount of $6,000.

The Committee on Appropriations in preparing this bill allowed for the star service of the country the last dollar that was estimated for by the Post-Office Department. If this amendment is adopted there will still be on all the items for the carriage of the mail by the railroads of the country quite a large reduction from the estimates. I think the $25,000 added to this item would more appropriately come here than in connection with the item on which it was offered as an amendment a few moments ago and voted down; for the reason that the compensation allowed for route agents is less than the compensation that is allowed to postal clerks; so that the money if given for this service would accomplish more than it would if appropriated on the other item.

I desire to say further that before making up my mind to ask the committee to grant an increase of $25,000 on this item I went to the superintendent of the railway mail service and with him went over all the items in reference to the service on all the railroads of the country, and I was assured by him that it would materially interfere with that efficient administration of this service that the country I think demands, to deny this increase. The amount is but small, and I submit that, while Congress proposes to give the last dollar that is asked for the purpose of carrying the mail by means of the star service, it would hardly be in keeping at the same time to insist that that very large and important interest that is represented by the mail service on the railroads of the country should be cut down so as to endanger its efficiency. I think, further, the gentlemen who are conversant with the operations of this Department and by personal observation have been brought to a knowledge in reference to it will agree with me that there is no service in the country more important in fostering the business interests of the country than this branch, and therefore I hope that this motion to increase the appropriation to $25,000 will prevail.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. In reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CLYMER,] I would suggest that he examine the figures contained in the statement which I have submitted before contending that this appropriation should be denied by reason of the excess of funds. It is there shown that for the first six months of the present fiscal year the amount expended in this branch of the service exceeded the amount of the appropriation provided thereby by over $4,000, and that for three-fourths of the fiscal year the expenditure exceeds the appropriation by over $7,000, which of course means a deficiency bill at some time. As will be seen, these postal-route clerks distribute the through mails upon their lines, the route agents distribute the local mails, and the mail messengers distribute the mails upon the termini of the routes upon which they are engaged. That is the theory of the service, and ought to be the practice. Every man knows that when a clerk or employé becomes acquainted with and accustomed to his duties, when it becomes a mere repetition of the same thing day after day and week after week, it becomes almost second nature and tends to accuracy and efficiency in the service. But for want of this small appropriation this theory has to be broken up. The postal clerks are compelled to perform the duties of route agents and vice versa, and mail messengers perform the duties of both. For want of a proper appropriation men are constantly being transferred from one line to another, and compelled to learn their duties all over again.

Mr. Chairman, could a better plan be devised to promote confusion and inefficiency? If the committee are determined not to make this appropriation, it is not for me to contend with them; but I think we ought to do it, in view of the facts and the necessities of the service. [Here the hammer fell.]

The question was taken on the amendment offered by Mr. BAKER, of Indiana; and on a division there were—ayes 54, noes 63.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For mail-route messengers, $165,000.

Mr. MONROE. In line 152, I move to strike out "$165,000," and to insert in lieu thereof "$171,000," which will make the amount exactly the same as the estimate furnished by the superintendent of the railway mail service. I favored the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WILLIAMS] to add $25,000 to the appropriation for the postal clerks, and regret that that amendment failed. I also voted for the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BAKER,] but as that amendment also failed I propose that to this last item for the compensation of clerks this small amount be added, which will bring it up to the estimate furnished by the Department.

The gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] whose industry and attention to this matter I am very glad to give him the fullest credit for, has informed us that clerks from the lower classes have been transferred to the highest class to render service as distributing clerks. What was the reason, what was the motive for that? It has plainly been done for the good of the service, because it was unavoidable; because the superintendent found that for the work ordinarily done by the distributing clerks he had not a sufficient force, and that it would be less injurious to the service and more convenient to withdraw clerks from the lower classes than to leave the higher class unequal to its work. Now if it is necessary, on account of the small appropriation which we make, to withdraw clerks in this way from one class to another, I think we ought to add something to this appropriation for messengers. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will assent to this amendment, and then I think we can go on with the bill with more satisfaction.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have no doubt that that is so.

Mr. MONROE. I desire to say that it might have relieved us somewhat if the gentleman from Georgia, when these items came up, had stated to us the grounds upon which he had reached the precise amounts put in the bill. The gentleman has cut off so much of one item and so much of another, but he does not tell us how he obtained his figures; whereas we have in the report of the superintendent of the mail service what seems to be a very rational basis for his estimates. So far as I have heard, the gentleman from Georgia has given us no estimates. He has not his explanation, for instance, why the postal clerks are to have only $1,275,000, why the route agents only $1,020,000, and why the mail messengers only $165,000. The committee seem to have made these reductions by a sort of hap-hazard blow struck at the estimates furnished by the Department. The gentleman, of course with the best intentions, has wished to reduce the amount and has happened to strike just here. He has not, so far as I know, given the reasons for this reduction, and I would be glad to be informed of the data upon which he reached his conclusions.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman says that I have not given my figuring. In that respect I have yielded to the evident disposition of the Committee of the Whole, that there should not be much debate. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MONROE] need not assume that we have gone to work without any intelligence, or, to use his own language, in a hap-hazard way to determine the amounts which should be appropriated for these several services. The gentleman will find, on page 105 of the report of the Post-Office Department, that there has been an increase in railroad building during the last year of only about 3.04 per cent. He will find that during the last year the Department actually expended only about the sum of $147,000 for this purpose, while we appropriated something more than that sum; I do not recollect the exact figures. We have allowed here an increase of 15 per cent., and we did it just because of the appeals which are continually being made for the service on the new lines that are being constructed. The item of increase in this amount is 15 per cent., while the increase of railroad building is only 3.04 per cent.

My friend talks about the way the estimates are made up in the Post-Office Department and in the several Departments. I wish he would take the pains to investigate how they are made up. In the last Congress they came before the committee with their estimate for a given sum for the item of railroad transportation, and on cross-examination they were compelled to admit that they had estimated for a million dollars more than the service actually needed. Take the compensation of postmasters and various other items, there was just the same loose method. They seem to go on the idea that they would ask largely, and though they might not get all they asked, perhaps they would get a pretty liberal sum. That is just about the system upon which these estimates have been made. We have taken the statement of the Sixth Auditor as to the amount expended in previous years, not for the last year only, and have watched the service in its various branches and thus reached our conclusion.

Mr. MONROE. May I just ask my friend, for I am desirous to get at the truth of this matter if I can, if he considers as too high the increase of 7 per cent. for postal clerks named at the top of page 6 of the report?

Mr. BLOUNT. I take great pleasure in saying emphatically that I do think so. If he will take up the reports of the Postmaster-General and of the Sixth Auditor for the last four or five years in all the midst of our business distresses he will find that they have been most prolific of promises that the business of the country was reviving. They have always seen signs of prosperity, and depression is always behind, and they looked forward to a large increase of business notwithstanding there was nothing which anybody else could see.

I remember that Mr. Jewell, while he was Postmaster-General, on one occasion proclaimed to the committee that he saw unmistakable signs of a return of prosperity to the country; he grew very happy over it. Yet notwithstanding all that the receipts fell off.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment has been exhausted.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. MONROE; and upon a division there were—ayes 43, noes 70.

Mr. MONROE. No quorum has voted. As this is a very small increase, I must call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. MONROE and Mr. BLOUNT were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 85, noes 80.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

SEC. 2. That if the revenue of the Post-Office Department shall be insufficient to meet the appropriations made by this act, then the sum of $4,056,274.72, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supply deficiencies in revenue of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1879.

Mr. DUNNELL. I should like to ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] what amount was appropriated last year for deficiencies?

Mr. BLOUNT. I have not the statute before me, but I think it was less than three millions last year. I understand, however, that there will probably be a deficit. The amount which the House first appropriated was amended in the Senate so as to bring the sum down to about three millions. The result is that an additional sum will have to be appropriated by way of deficiency.

I ask consent at this time to move an amendment or a modification to an amendment which was adopted on Saturday last. I move to amend the first proviso of that amendment by striking out the words "under section 3 of this act," and inserting in lieu thereof "under section 7 of the act of July 12, 1876."

There being no objection, the amendment was modified accordingly.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Kentucky. I move to add to the second section of this bill, just read, that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk began the reading of the amendment, as follows:

Provided, That the disbursements of the moneys appropriated for the preparation and publication of post-route maps be made by a regularly appointed disbursing officer of the Post-Office Department, according to the laws, rules, and customs as recognized by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department: And provided also, That the pay-rolls—

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to raise the point of order that we have passed that portion of the bill relative to post-route maps.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Kentucky. That portion of the bill was passed before the necessity for this amendment was known to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department. The discovery has been made since that this amendment is absolutely necessary.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will reserve my point of order until the gentleman has made an explanation.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Kentucky. When the provision of the bill was under discussion which made an appropriation of $25,000 for post-route maps, &c., it was not known by the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department that the money was disbursed by an officer who executed no bond. That fact has since been discovered, and I desire in justice to the Government and in justice to the employees themselves, that the money shall be disbursed by a bonded officer of the Government. That is all there is of the amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Provided, That the disbursements of the moneys appropriated for the preparation and publication of post-route maps be made by a regular bonded disbursing officer of the Post-Office Department, according to the laws, rules, and customs as recognized by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department: And provided also, That the pay-rolls of the draughtsmen, clerks, female clerks, colored messengers, and other employees of the topographer's office shall be regularly made out by the chief of the topographer's office, examined, and checked by the appointment clerk of the Post-Office Department and the payments thereof made by a bonded disbursing officer of the Post-Office Department: And also provided further, That all purchases made by the chief of the topographer's office for the preparation and publication of post-route maps shall be accounted for by vouchers accompanied by affidavit; and the moneys therefor shall be disbursed by a disbursing officer of the Post-Office Department; and all of the above disbursements shall be paid out of the appropriation for the preparation and publication of post-route maps.

Mr. BLOUNT. I withdraw my point of order so as to allow the House to vote upon the amendment on its merits.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK, of Iowa. I move to amend by inserting the following as an additional section:

SEC. 3. Nothing in this or other acts shall prevent the payment of the per diem of $5 to the chief of special agents appointed under section 4017 of the Revised Statutes; nor to such of said agents as may be specially detailed and stationed at particular localities for service and whose entire time may be so occupied under the direction of the Postmaster-General; but in such cases last mentioned the amount of per diem may be adjusted and allowed by the Postmaster-General, not to exceed $5 per day.

Mr. BLOUNT. I raise the point of order that we have passed the subject to which this amendment relates.

Mr. CLARK, of Iowa. This amendment does not propose to go back to any previous portion of the bill. It is general in its character, relating to the chief of special agents and to those who are specially detailed and stationed in charge of particular divisions as at Chicago, Saint Louis, &c.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the paragraph which makes appropriation for those officers been passed?

Mr. CLARK, of Iowa. It certainly has been.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules the amendment out of order.

Mr. CLARK, of Iowa. The amendment does not relate back to any previous portion of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules the amendment out of order.

The Clerk read the last section of the bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the committee rise and report the bill, with the amendments, to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MILLS reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the post-office appropriation bill, and had directed him to report the same with sundry amendments and recommend its passage.

Mr. BLOUNT. I demand the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; which was first upon agreeing to the amendments.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask that the several amendments be voted on separately.

The first amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was read, as follows:

In line 10, after the words "one hundred," insert "and fifty;" so as to make the clause read:

For mail depredations and special agents, $150,000.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 72, noes 77.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, and Mr. BLOUNT were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 94, noes 74.

Mr. BLOUNT. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 102, nays 92, not voting 97; as follows:

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I rise to a question of personal explanation for the first time in my life; not that I deem it a matter of very great importance. I find in the RECORD of this morning a speech printed, purporting to have been delivered by the honorable gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] on Wednesday, the 24th instant. As I was here all that day and did not hear it, I presume it was either delivered at the night session of that day, or, as I understand, leave was given to print it. In that speech it is charged that bills have been introduced by northern men for the benefit of northern people, in which are asked $1,569,122,035.13. But that is not the worst of it. According to that gentleman, I myself introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3239) which asks an appropriation of $1,300,000,000; nearly the whole pabulum on which this indictment against northern Representatives is founded.

Mr. CHALMERS. Allow me to suggest to the gentleman that my colleague [Mr. MONEY] is now absent, and will be absent for a day or two. I hope the gentleman will postpone any remarks he has to make until my colleague returns.

Mr. PHILLIPS. My remarks will be in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] when he returns.

Mr. PHILLIPS. As I was saying, the amount which my bill is said to represent constitutes nearly the whole pabulum on which this indictment against northern Representatives is founded. It is a very respectable amount and looks well in print.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his question of personal privilege.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I will state it. I have been charged with introducing a bill for an appropriation of $1,300,000,000. [Great laughter.] I wish to show that I did not introduce any such bill; and in order that my bill may be correctly understood I here give a copy of it:

A bill to provide for a survey of and estimates for a ship-canal, with stone sides and bottom, from deep tide-water near the mouth of the Mississippi River, to Saint Louis, Missouri, with branches to Pittsburgh, Chicago, Saint Paul, and Omaha.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That there shall be appointed by the President two commissioners, who shall be practical engineers, to act with an officer of the Engineer Corps of the Army, and the three shall constitute a commission to make a survey of, together with plans and estimates for, a ship-canal to be constructed from deep tide-water, at the most practicable point near the mouths or outlets of the Mississippi River, thence up the valley of said river, on the best location; said plans and specifications shall be for a canal, with stone sides and bottom, large enough for two large ocean-steamers to pass each other; and they shall survey and make a plan and estimates for two basins, one at Memphis and one at Saint Louis, sufficient in capacity to harbor fifty sea-going vessels; and the said commission shall make their report at the earliest practicable moment, which report, plan of survey, and estimates shall be submitted to Congress.

Sec. 2. Having completed and submitted such plan and estimates for said canal, the commission shall without delay proceed to survey branches for said canal, and connecting therewith at suitable points, to Pittsburgh, by the valley of the Ohio River; to Chicago, by the most suitable route, connecting with deep water at the lakes; to Saint Paul, by the valley of the Mississippi River; and to Omaha, by the valley of the Missouri River; and shall report on each of these branches as they are respectively completed, under direction of the President.

Sec. 3. The said commission shall in their plans and estimates provide for the feeding of said canal from clear-water rivers and streams.

Sec. 4. The sum of $30,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money not otherwise appropriated in the Treasury.

By reference to the last section of the bill it will be seen that it appropriates only the sum of $30,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary. Now, they can do some very remarkable things in Mississippi, especially in the arithmetic of elections.

Mr. SINGLETON. I call the gentleman to order; he is not speaking upon a question of personal privilege.

Mr. PHILLIPS. It is personal to me. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Speaker, as I was saying, they can do some remarkable things in Mississippi, especially in the arithmetic of elections; but raising $30,000 to $1,300,000,000 is a remarkable feat even for Mississippi. I presume the gentleman's figures for the other little bagatelle of $263,000,000 are equally accurate. What makes the matter a little harsh to me is that the $30,000 asked for by the bill I introduced was, if obtained, not to be expended in the Northern States, as he charges, but between Saint Louis and the mouth of the Mississippi River—all in the South, and no inconsiderable portion in the State of Mississippi.

Mr. TURNER. I raise the point of order that this is not a question of privilege, and there is no pretext for claiming it to be such.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is hardly a question of privilege.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I submit that I am in order.

Mr. TURNER. I call upon the Chair to decide whether this is a personal explanation.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I shall finish in a moment.

Mr. TURNER. I do not think the gentleman himself will pretend that this is a personal explanation.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I desire to state—

Mr. FINLEY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I want to know whether it is a "question of privilege" for a member of this House to show that the statements in another member's speech do not conform to the facts in the case. [Laughter.] If that is a "question of privilege," I can take one-half of the speeches of gentlemen on the other side and show that they are not true. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Kansas is overstepping the mark; that he is not speaking to any question of personal privilege.

Mr. McMAHON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have leave to print.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires that the gentleman will speak to the point.

Mr. PHILLIPS. A flagrant indictment has been brought against me personally as having introduced a bill proposing to appropriate $1,300,000,000. [Laughter.] If the gentleman will persist in bringing a bill of indictment against me or against the republican party I would remind him that there is one item which he appears to have overlooked—$5,000,000,000 for suppressing the rebellion and preserving the Union, all of which was taken from the Treasury or funded in debt by the votes of republicans, but which was chiefly expended, as would be the $30,000 I ask to have appropriated, in the Southern States.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say that he does not think the remarks of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PHILLIPS] involve a personal explanation or a question of privilege.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, transmitting communications from the acting First Assistant Postmaster-General and the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, relative to certain appropriations for that Department; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ELECTION CONTEST—LYNCH VS. CHALMERS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House depositions in the contested-election case of Lynch vs. Chalmers, from the sixth congressional district of Mississippi; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:
To Mr. WHITTHORNE, for four days;
To Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York, for one week;
To Mr. MULLER, for five days, on account of important business;
To Mr. WILLIAMS, of New York, for ten days, on account of important business;
To Mr. MCCOOK, for four days, on account of business; and
To Mr. ITTNER, for one day.

DRY-DOCK AT MARE ISLAND NAVY-YARD.

Mr. CLYMER, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Appropriations the following; which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (H. R. No. 721) to appropriate money for the completion of the stone dry-dock and other public works at Mare Island navy-yard, California.

JOHN HENDERSON.

Mr. SAYLER, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1727) for the relief of John Henderson; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I move that the House adjourn.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT TILL MONDAY.

Mr. PAGE. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion of Mr. PAGE was not agreed to.

The motion of Mr. LUTTRELL, that the House adjourn, was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 27, 1878.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SETTLERS ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. WIGGINTON, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 3796, a bill (H. R. No. 4570) for the relief of settlers on the public lands, and to provide for the repayment of certain fees and commissions paid on void entries of public lands, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed with the accompanying report, and recommitted.

STRENGTH OF IRON, STEEL, ETC.

Mr. LATHROP. I ask by unanimous consent to submit a resolution asking the President for information as to the action of the board appointed to make experiments in testing the strength and value of iron, steel, and other materials.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The preamble and resolution were read, as follows:

Whereas by section 4, of chapter 123, of volume 18, Statutes at Large, approved March 3, 1875, the sum of $50,000 was appropriated, and the further sum of $45,000 appropriated in 1873, made available for the purpose of experiments in testing iron and steel; and by said section 4 the President was authorized to appoint a board to make such experiments, to consist of one officer of engineers of United States Army, one officer of ordnance of United States Army, one line officer of United States Navy, one engineer of United States Navy, and three civilians, who should be experts, and by said section it was made the duty of said board when appointed to convene at the earliest practicable moment, at such place as might be designated by the President, for the purpose of determining by actual test the strength and value of all kinds of iron, steel and other metals which might be submitted to them or by them procured, and to prepare tables which should exhibit the strength and value of said materials for construction and mechanical purposes, to provide for the building of a suitable machine for establishing such tests; and

Whereas by chapter 226, of volume 19, of Statutes at Large, approved July 14, 1876, "for completing experiments in testing iron, steel, and other metals," as provided in above-mentioned section 4, there was appropriated the sum of $19,396.98: Therefore,

Resolved, That the President be, and hereby is, requested to communicate to this House what action has been taken under said provisions of said acts; and if said board has made tests of the strength and value of iron, steel, and other metals, and prepare tables thereof, as contemplated by said section 4, that the results of such tests by said board may be communicated to this House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman that board was abolished by the very section of the law alluded to.

Mr. LATHROP. I am informed that the board have made the tests provided for, but that the conclusions at which they have arrived have never been reported to Congress.

The SPEAKER. The money has been all spent, and the Committee on Appropriations recommended the abolition of the board.

Mr. LATHROP. That may be true, but the results of those experiments have never been made known, and the resolution of inquiry which I have proposed is for the purpose of securing a report to Congress for publication.

The SPEAKER. The Chair only desired to state the fact so members of the House might be informed on the subject.

Mr. BURCHARD. Is it a resolution of inquiry?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. BURCHARD. Let it be read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. CONGER. There can be no harm in the adoption of that resolution calling for information.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the object of the resolution is to obtain the information received by that board. The Chair took the liberty of saying to the gentleman that Congress had abolished the board after an expenditure, as the Chair remembers, of $69,000.

Mr. CONGER. Whatever result has been obtained ought to be communicated to Congress.

The resolution was adopted.

CARLOS BUTTERFIELD.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 168) requiring the Secretary of State to furnish information to Congress in reference to the claim of Carlos Butterfield against the government of Denmark; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH BAUMER.

Mr. HERBERT. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution for reference to the Committee of Accounts:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, directed to pay Joseph Baumer out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives the sum of $71.17, for services due and unpaid while acting as messenger for the Forty-fifth Congress.

Mr. CONGER. These resolutions come in so frequently and we travel so fast without objection in their adoption that I think we ought now to wait until they are all put together, so we may see how many of them there are. I object.

JOSEPH BURT.

Mr. BREWER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4571) providing for an increase of pension to Joseph Burt, of Michigan, a lieutenant in the war of 1812; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

RELIEF OF SETTLERS.

Mr. STEWART, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4572) for the relief of settlers on the public lands; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. O'NEILL. As we are approaching the end of the session, and time becomes precious, and as Monday, under the rules, is devoted to introduction of bills for reference, I hope hereafter members will introduce bills at that time, and not take up the time of the House when such propositions are not in order. I do not object, as I am anxious to see gentlemen obliged, but I hope the presentation of bills will be made at the proper time.

JULIET LEEF AND JOHN M'KEE.

Mr. ROBERTS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4573) to provide for the settlement of the claims of Juliet Leef and John McKee; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

RYAN, GEARY, AND OTHERS.

Mr. ACKLEN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution for the relief of Ryan, Geary, and others in the State of Louisiana; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

A resolution for the relief of Ryan, Geary, and others, and for the appointment by the Speaker of a committee of investigation.

Whereas in the parish of Calcasieu, in the State of Louisiana, there are numerous log-owners who are suffering illegal oppression under the exactions of the Department of the Interior, namely, Ryan, Geary, Perkins, Norris, and others, through the corrupt practices of a special agent of this Department, one M. A. Carter, aided and abetted by certain other officials, against whom charges have been preferred; Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and is hereby, authorized to appoint a committee of three members of this House, who shall select a clerk and deputy sergeant-at-arms and proceed to the State of Louisiana at such time as said committee shall deem proper, with full power to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and take testimony, and employ such clerks or stenographers as may be needed, to investigate the charges of corruption and malfeasance in office preferred against M. A. Carter, special agent of the Department of the Interior, and charges preferred and to be preferred against other officials and parties connected with the Calcasieu log seizures as that committee may deem necessary to ascertain their truth, and report the results of said investigation to this House at its next session.

COMMERCIAL HIGHWAY.

Mr. BURDICK, by unanimous consent, presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Iowa, in reference to securing a commercial highway by water between the Mississippi River and Lake Michigan by the valleys of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

GEORGE L. SHRYOCK.

Mr. COLE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4574) to remove the political disabilities of George L. Shryock, of Missouri; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, removes all political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth article of amendments to the Constitution upon George L. Shryock, of Missouri.

Mr. HUBBELL. Is there a petition accompanying the bill?

Mr. COLE. There is.

EVENING SESSION ON MONDAY.

Mr. FULLER. I ask that, by unanimous consent, there be an evening session on Monday, at seven o'clock and thirty minutes p. m., for the reception of reports from the Committee on Public Lands, no other business to be transacted.

Mr. FINLEY. Does that include the consideration of the reports by the House?

Mr. FULLER. Yes, sir.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. FULLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the order was made; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. The latter motion was agreed to.

GEORGE B. COSBY.

Mr. LUTTRELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4575) to remove the political disabilities of George B. Cosby, of Butte County, California; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

LOWELL A. CHAMBERLIN.

Mr. BANNING, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4576) for the relief of Lowell A. Chamberlin, First Lieutenant First Artillery, United States Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERTISING OF MAIL-LETTINGS.

Mr. WADDELL. I ask unanimous consent to report back, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, the bill (H. R. No. 3987) to regulate the advertising of mail-lettings, with Senate amendments. I am instructed by the committee to move non-concurrence in the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. DUNNELL. Let the amendments be read.

The amendments of the Senate were read.

The question being taken, the amendments were non-concurred in. Mr. WADDELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were non-concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ESTIMATES FOR SUBSISTENCE OF THE ARMY.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the chief clerk of the War Department, transmitting revised estimates for subsistence of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chaplain of the House asks leave of absence for two weeks from Monday next to attend the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. His place will be supplied by Rev. Drs. Ames and Domer.

There was no objection, and leave was granted.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. SHALENBERGER for three days.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. MCGOWAN. I ask the privilege of making a short personal statement.

During my absence the past two weeks the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means made a statement which will be found in the proceedings of the 16th instant, which I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask to have read the two paragraphs that are marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

Now, I can assure the gentleman from Michigan that I think I am the only sufferer by the omission referred to. The letter which was read, and to which the gentleman has referred, came to me under circumstances and disappeared under circumstances which I shall relate. As early as January last a colleague of the gentleman, with whom I had no personal acquaintance, wrote me a letter inclosing a letter from this firm transacting business at Jackson, in the State of Michigan, stating that so far as they were concerned they required no protection; that they manufactured very largely; that they exported their goods to Europe; and that they were doing very well. The gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. MCGOWAN,] the gentleman's colleague, indorsed in his letter to me the respectability of this firm, and gave in addition what appeared to me to be a full indorsement of the position which they had assumed. In preparing myself for the opening speech in the tariff debate, among other papers I came across this. I read it and saw that it was in the line of a discussion which I intended to pursue. But having no acquaintance with the gentleman, through my friend, his colleague, sitting on my left, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] I sought his acquaintance and sought his permission to have read as part of my speech the communication which he had sent to me. He gave it fully. Therefore, sir, upon that occasion I had that letter read; but when I came to revise my speech the next morning the letter was missing, and everything relating to it in the proceedings of the House was missing also. The explanation that I have been enabled to receive respecting it was that after the Clerk had read the letter from the desk it was handed to the reporters of the RECORD, and has disappeared and has never been seen since, with the additional recollection on the part of the gentleman in front of me that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCGOWAN,] came to the Clerk's desk and inquired for the letter before I had concluded my speech; and the presumption is that he felt he had a right to recover that letter, and as he has left the city I presume he has taken it with him. Therefore if the letter did not appear, I am quite sure that in no way am I responsible for this omission from the RECORD, because I have never seen it since I sent it to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. MCGOWAN. Some time during last winter after I had sent the letter of General Withington to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD,] I understood he allowed copies to be made both of that letter and of my letter to him; and the same were published in the Detroit Post and Tribune. I believe they are exact copies and I now send them to the Clerk's desk and ask that they be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, January 3, 1878.

DEAR SIR: I hand you this inclosed letter from Messrs. Withington & Cooley, a most worthy and successful firm of manufacturers in my district.

I am informed by these gentlemen that they have purchased bar steel in England, brought it to their place of manufacture, Jackson, Michigan, made it into forks and other farming tools, and, returning the manufactured tools, sold them in England, where they have established a market at a good profit.

I am, sir, with respect, your obedient servant,

J. H. MCGOWAN.

The Hon. FERNANDO WOOD.

JACKSON, MICHIGAN, December 13, 1877.

DEAR SIR: I notice by the papers that the Ways and Means Committee are in receipt of various communications from manufacturers and others protesting against reductions in the tariff, &c.

As a point on the other side will you please submit to the committee the fact that the manufacturers of hay and manure forks, cast-steel hoes, garden-rakes, and like tools are able not only to sustain themselves at home against foreign manufacturers, but to export their products to England, France, Germany, and other European countries. Not less than thirty thousand dozen hay and manure forks were shipped from this country to Europe last year, and I think more than that.

The chief cost of a fork is in the steel and the labor thereon. It is comparatively a plain tool and not protected by patents. England has been supposed to excel in the production of steel and goods therefrom. We ask no protection on our part against her or any other country.

Half of our product of forks last year went abroad.

Very truly, yours,

W. H. WITHINGTON,
Treasurer.

The Hon. JAMES H. MCGOWAN.

Mr. MCGOWAN. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is true that the day before the gentleman from New York made his speech he sent for me and courteously asked the privilege of using the letter of General Withington in his speech. I had no thought at the time that he desired to or would have occasion to use the letter I had written. I told the gentleman at the time that he would have to meet the charge that the manufactured articles spoken of in the letter of General Withington were manufactured by prison labor. The next day during the speech of the gentleman I heard my name read by the Clerk at the desk and I then understood that the Clerk had read my letter. Not remembering exactly what was contained in it I went to the Clerk's desk after the letters were both read and asked to see them. The Clerk informed me that they were in the hands of the reporters. I then remarked that I would find them in the RECORD the next day and went away. I did not see the letters. I did not take them away. I never have seen them since I sent them to the gentleman from New York. I should have thought it very unbecoming in me to have carried away from the House a portion of the gentleman's speech, and I am astonished that he should have supposed I did so or should have raised the presumption at all that I carried away the letters in question.

Mr. WOOD. I desire permission of the House to say one word. I think the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCGOWAN,] has not read carefully the remarks I made with reference to the letter of which he speaks, or he would not apprehend that I charged him with having taken it, for I did not. When I came to revise my speech the day after its delivery that letter was missing, as also everything in connection with it. When I made inquiry for the letter, the only information I could procure was that the gentleman from Michigan had been to the Clerk's desk making inquiries about it. I did assume—it was merely an assumption upon my part—that the gentleman, as the letter was addressed to him, had possibly taken possession of it. I did not intend, however, to reflect upon the gentleman in any way, even if he had thought proper to take the letter. Therefore the House, I trust, will acquit me of any intention of making even an indirect charge against the gentleman. The letter was missing; it never was recovered; and the gentleman was the last person making inquiries in relation to it. It was but natural that I should suppose that he might have taken possession of it. I now acquit him of having taken it or of knowing anything about it.

Mr. MCGOWAN. I wish merely to say that it was an assumption which, had I been in the gentleman's place, I would hardly have made in regard to him, that he would carry away a part of my speech. I wonder that he assumed that I would carry away a part of his speech when I had no control over it.

TAX ON STATE BANKS.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina, by unanimous consent, submitted the following memorial; which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

To the Congress of the United States:

We, the undersigned, believe that the tax of 10 per cent. on the circulating notes issued by banks chartered by the different States is unjust and against the best interests of the people, and therefore most respectfully petition Congress to repeal that clause in the national-bank law which levies a tax of 10 per cent. on the circulating notes of the State banks.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I wish to say merely that this petition represents the wishes of nine-tenths of the people of North Carolina.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HALE. I now call for the regular order.

Mr. VANCE. I ask consent—

Mr. HALE. I called for the regular order, with the understanding that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS,] will move to go into the Committee of the Whole on the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. VANCE. It will take me but a moment.

Mr. FRANKLIN. I insist upon the regular order.

Mr. SPARKS. I move that the rules be suspended and that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. POTTER in the chair.)

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. No. 4549) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes.

Mr. SPARKS. I ask that the first and formal reading of the bill be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. SPARKS. I will state to the Committee of the Whole that this bill has been under consideration for many months by the Committee on Appropriations and has been prepared with a great deal of care. It meets the approval of the Secretary of the Interior and of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. It was the unanimous report of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations and is the unanimous report of the Committee on Appropriations to this House. I can see no necessity for general debate, and ask that the Clerk now proceed to read the bill by paragraphs for amendment.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill by paragraphs, and read the following:

Be it enacted, &c., That the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of paying the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes, namely:

For pay of one superintendent of Indian affairs for the tribes in Dakota, $2,000;
For pay of one clerk for the Dakota superintendency, $1,200.

Mr. HAYES. I move to amend the last paragraph read, in relation to the clerk for the Dakota superintendency, by striking out "$1,200" and inserting "$1,600." I do not wish to make any speech on the subject, but will simply state that $1,600 is the amount which the clerk of that agency now receives. I think, when we consider all the circumstances, that amount is little enough. I hope, therefore, that this item in the bill will be increased from $1,200 to $1,600.

Mr. SPARKS. The amount named in the bill is the amount fixed by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs himself, and is certainly sufficient for the clerk. That is all I have to say about it.

Mr. HAYES. I would like to ask the gentleman if the clerk of that superintendency does not now receive $1,600 a year.

Mr. SPARKS. I will state to the gentleman that that superintendency has been abolished. It proved to be somewhat of a nuisance and has been abolished.

Mr. HAYES. As I understand, the superintendency of the Dakota Indians has not been abolished.

Mr. SPARKS. Ah! I am mistaken; I beg the gentleman's pardon; I thought he was referring to another agency. The central superintendency has been abolished; there is no clerk for it now.

Mr. HAYES. As I understand it, there is a clerk at the present time, or was about a week ago, who receives $1,600 a year for his salary.

Mr. SPARKS. I will state to the gentleman that there is no estimate for any clerk at the Dakota superintendency.

Mr. HAYES. Is there not a clerk there now, and did not he receive $1,600 last year?

Mr. SPARKS. That is in the central superintendency in Dakota.

Mr. HAYES. It is all the same, except a change of name.

Mr. SPARKS. The gentleman will find that there is no clerk at the Dakota superintendency.

Mr. HAYES. The two superintendencies have been consolidated and they are now under a new name. Last year they had a clerk for that superintendency who received $1,600 a year, and that is all I ask for now.

The question was taken upon the amendment offered by Mr. HAYES, and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following, in relation to the Chippewas of the Mississippi:

For thirty-second of forty-six installments, to be paid to the Chippewas of the Mississippi, per third article of treaty of August 2, 1847, and fifth article of treaty of March 19, 1867, $1,000.

For fourth of ten installments of annuity in money, last series, per third article of treaty of February 22, 1855, and third article of treaty of 1854, $20,000.

For the support of a school or schools upon said reservation during the pleasure of the President, in accordance with third article of treaty of March 19, 1867, $1,000.

Mr. STEWART. I desire to amend the bill by adding, after line 323, under that heading, "For pay of a physician, $1,500."

Mr. SPARKS. I will state to the committee, Mr. Chairman, that there has been no estimate from the Department for the pay of a physician at this place. We have so far as that matter is concerned simply made up this bill in keeping with the direction of the Department estimates submitted to us. I ask attention to page 97 of those estimates in which it will be seen that these Chippewa Indians have had appropriated for them in this bill for annuities $25,400 and the number of them is very small. We think they have got enough.

Mr. STEWART. The treaty stipulations with these Indians provide for a physician, but the treaty expires in July of this year and the matter escaped attention of the Department. They informed me that they had requested of the committee an appropriation which they deemed necessary for a physician at this agency. That necessity is so obvious that it is hardly necessary to detain the House by discussing it, but I think it of the utmost importance that at an agency of this kind where there are nearly two thousand people there should be a medical attendant.

Mr. SPARKS. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the Department had called my attention to this matter?

Mr. STEWART. I was assured two weeks ago that they had called the attention of your committee to the matter, and again this morning I was told so.

Mr. SPARKS. If they ever attempted to do it they failed. My attention was never called to this matter until this morning. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the treaty requires the Government to furnish these Indians with a physician?

Mr. STEWART. I think so.

Mr. SPARKS. When does that treaty expire?

Mr. STEWART. In July, 1878.

Mr. SPARKS. Precisely; and this is one of those matters which, under the rule universally adopted in the Department when the treaty stipulations expire, drop them from the estimate. We are now appropriating for the fiscal year ending July 30, 1879. This stipulation of the treaty expires this year on the 1st of July, and these Indians have no claim for a physician, and to provide them with one would be a gratuity, and I think from my examination of the affairs of this tribe that gratuities ought not to be given to it.

Mr. STEWART. If it be a gratuity I think that this great Government can afford to pay $1,600 to provide this agency with a physician.

Mr. SPARKS. You cannot do it in this case without doing it for a dozen others.

The question was taken on Mr. STEWART's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For gilling-twine for nets, $400; in all, $25,400.

Mr. CONGER. I move to amend that clause by inserting after the word "dollars," the words:

Provided that such gilling-twine, if imported, shall be admitted free of duty.

But there are several provisions in this bill for the purchase of gilling-twine for the Indians.

Now, the only twine suitable for gill-nets is imported from Ireland and it pays, if I remember aright, 60 per cent. duty. The Government is paying several hundred dollars, as appears from this bill, for the Indians.

Mr. KELLEY. The duty upon gilling-twine is 40 per cent.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania informs us that the duty is only 40 per cent. Now, the law provides that when the Government imports anything for its own use it shall be admitted free of duty, but here we are providing for this gilling-twine for the Indians under treaty stipulations and there is 40 per cent. duty on it. I find in this item $400 for gilling-twine, and again in other places in the bill various appropriations for gilling-twine. Inasmuch as that twine is the only one suitable for gill-nets there is no reason why the Government should pay 40 per cent. duty upon it.

I have asked this House from time to time to admit gilling-twine free of duty for the benefit of our fishermen. Such a provision has passed this House once or twice but has failed to meet the concurrence of the other branch. Our treaty stipulations with Great Britain provide that Canadian fishermen who are allowed to import their twine free of duty may bring their fish free of duty to compete with American fishermen and Indian fishermen; yet our fishermen and the Indian fishermen are compelled to pay 40 per cent. upon this most expensive part of the fishermen's apparatus. The American or the Indian fisherman who competes with the Canadian fishermen in the very waters where these gill-nets are used must pay twice as much for exactly the same outfit as the Canadian fisherman pays; and mainly because he has to pay 40 per cent. duty on this very expensive twine for his net.

Mr. EDEN. Does not the duty paid on this twine go into the Treasury?

Mr. CONGER. It goes into the Treasury; but the Government buys this twine for the Indians. Now all the property that the Government buys for itself is by the law of the land admitted free of duty; but when the Government is using the money of the Indians, as in this case, to buy gilling-twine, those Indians are obliged to pay 40 per cent. duty out of their own money.

Mr. EDEN. Might not the Indian just as well pay this duty as the white man? We make the white man pay it.

Mr. CONGER. But the Government pays the money of the Indian for twine which it buys for him, and in doing so it makes him pay this duty out of his money.

Mr. EDEN. I have made a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I desire to reserve the point of order, but I want to make a statement. It is not true, as stated by the gentleman from Michigan, that there is any treaty stipulation by which any definite sum of money is allowed to these Indians for gilling-twine. Four hundred dollars, the amount proposed in this bill, is the exact sum recommended by the Department as necessary to be expended for the purchase of gilling-twine for these Indians. If the provision suggested by the gentleman from Michigan should be inserted in the bill, the simple effect would be to enable the Government to purchase this twine without the payment of duty. The Government, when it purchases these imported goods, is compelled to pay the duty as a part of the price, that duty coming back into the Treasury. If these twines are to be admitted free of duty this appropriation should be cut down to $300 or less, which would be all that would be needed; for, as I have said, no treaty with these Indians specifies that any particular amount of money shall be spent for gilling-twine; the provision simply is that the Government shall furnish the Indians with this twine. We propose by this bill to give the full amount of money that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs says is necessary in the present state of the market to buy this twine. If you remove the duty and allow the appropriation to remain as it is, you simply require that these Indians shall be furnished with more twine than the Department says they need.

Mr. CONGER. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word.

Mr. EDEN. I have made a point of order on the amendment, when first offered, that it proposes in an appropriation bill to change the tariff laws.

Mr. CONGER. Now, I make a further remark—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. CONGER. Not on the point of order. It is too late to raise that. The amendment has been debated.

Mr. EDEN. I made the point at the time the amendment was offered.

Mr. CONGER. Then I withdraw the motion and renew it.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Now that the amendment is renewed, I make the point of order that it is new legislation and does not tend to a reduction of expenditures.

Mr. CONGER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to correct the gentleman.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I call for the decision of the Chair on the point of order.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman has himself debated the motion, and should be the last man to insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan desires to be heard a moment on the point of order. The Chair thinks the committee will save time by hearing him. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. I think so too. Now, in reference to the point of order, this provision is for the thirty-second of forty-six installments to be paid to the Chippewas of Mississippi by the third article of the treaty. This is money which by the treaty the United States Government is to expend for certain things for the benefit of the Indians. Whether this expenditure is more or less, it is treaty money, and if my amendment prevails it would require but $260 to get for the Indians the exact amount of twine for which otherwise $400 must be paid, so that there would remain so much more money to be expended for the benefit of the Indians. This is the truth of the matter. This is no change of law. This is saying how a particular amount of money shall be expended, and, as I understand, it is the proper amount for this purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The effect of the amendment is to specially relieve this Indian fund from the payment of a duty of 40 per cent. now imposed on twine of this description. Its effect will be to change the general law. It is therefore not in order to an appropriation bill. The Chair sustains the point of order and rules the amendment out. The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. SPARKS. I move to amend in line 961 under the heading of "Sacs and Foxes of the Mississippi," by inserting after the word "school" the words "a farmer for the Sacs and Foxes of the Mississippi at the agency in Iowa;" so it will read as follows:

For interest on $200,000, at 5 per cent., per second article of treaty of October 11, 1842, $40,000: Provided, That the sum of $1,500 of this amount shall be used for the pay of a physician and for purchase of medicine, and the further sum of $1,000 for the support of a school and a farmer for the Sacs and Foxes of the Mississippi at the agency in Iowa; in all, $51,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

REMOVAL, SETTLEMENT, SUBSISTENCE, AND SUPPORT OF INDIANS.

For support of industrial schools and for other educational purposes for the Indian tribes, $60,000.

Support of Chippewas on White Earth reservation:

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, in the care and support of the Otter Tail, Pillager, Pembina, and Mississippi Chippewa Indians, on the White Earth reservation in Minnesota, and to assist them in their agricultural operations, $5,000.

Mr. POUND. I move to insert after line 1343 the following:

Support of Chippewas of Lake Superior at the La Pointe agency:

For this amount or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior in erecting agency buildings, purchase of goods and supplies for the aged, sick, and infirm, or in any other respect to promote their civilization, comfort, and improvement, $2,000.

I desire to have the attention of the committee and of the gentleman having this subject in charge.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I did not quite catch the amendment moved by the gentleman from Wisconsin, and hope it will be again read, to see whether it is not amenable to the point of order.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I make the point of order that it is new legislation not in the interest of economy. It is not warranted by existing law. I desire to say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that he will find under the provisions of this bill, so far as the Chippewas of Lake Superior are concerned, every dollar is appropriated asked for in the Book of Estimates which I hold in my hand.

Mr. POUND. Mr. Chairman, I represent a few red men, and however unwarrantable the presumption may be, nevertheless I believe I will assume to know something about my constituency, including those red men. While I have the utmost confidence in the ability, integrity, and good intentions of the Committee on Appropriations, I think they have omitted this item from some misunderstanding of the situation. Now, in reference to this agency, known as the Chippewas of Lake Superior, I only desire to say—

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I wish to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin a question, and that is to ask him whether he claims this amendment is authorized by existing law?

Mr. POUND. I do.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Where is the law for it?

Mr. POUND. I have not the time just now to hunt it up, but it will be found in the law of common sense. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, this amendment relates to the Chippewas known as the Chippewas of Lake Superior at La Pointe, Wisconsin, and includes reservations known as Flambeau, Lac Courtes Oreilles, Bad River, Red Cliff, Grand Portage, Fond du Lac, and Boies Fort. The appropriation distinctively named in this bill includes the first six reservations as beneficiaries, the latter being included in another item. There is appropriated for this agency the sum of $15,800 for all purposes. The amount estimated by the Department is $17,800. The Department failed to include in their estimate the item recited in the amendment. Of this $15,800, $8,500 is required to pay employés for this agency, including these six reservations which I have named; leaving less than $5,000 to be distributed among more than four thousand Indians. And I wish to say to the committee that it is the rule in this agency to distribute no moneys—

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I insist on my point of order.

Mr. POUND. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will not insist on the point of order. It is not often that I occupy the floor, and I think that the House might afford to hear me once for the space of five minutes. I was saying it is the rule of this agency to disburse no moneys except for labor actually performed, and the amount appropriated leaves the sum less than $5,000 for more than four thousand Indians, none of which is to be distributed except for labor performed. Now, the important point I wish to reach is this, that the agency buildings have been destroyed by fire recently. In January last the agency buildings at Red Cliff were entirely destroyed, and within the last two years the blacksmith's house and the farmer's house at Bad River have been destroyed, and this small sum is required to rebuild the agency buildings, which are indispensable, and the farmer's and blacksmith's houses, which are also indispensable, and for the further purpose, if there be anything left, of maintaining about four hundred old and infirm Indians who are unable to work, and therefore not entitled to any part of the appropriation applicable for labor.

Mr. SPARKS. I ask the ruling of the Chair on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment appropriating $2,000 for the purpose therein stated. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BAKER] raises the point of order that there is no legislation authorizing such an appropriation—

Mr. POUND. I insist that it is a capitious point. The clause just read by the Clerk, to which this is an amendment, is equally liable to the same point of order.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I should be very glad to accommodate the gentleman, but as we have provided in the bill the entire amount estimated for by the Department, I do not believe it is right to appropriate for the purpose named in the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana made the point of order that there was no law authorizing the appropriation asked for by the amendment. The gentleman from Wisconsin insisted there was, and quoted the law of common sense, as the Chair understood him, as his authority. The Chair thinks that will hardly bring this amendment within the rule which requires appropriation authorized by statute law.

Mr. POUND. The common sense of this House will readily understand that the law applies just as much to my amendment as to the item which was last read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin now insists that if there be any provision of law for the paragraph reported by the Committee on Appropriations it may cover his amendment as well. That may be so. The Chair does not know whether it is so or not. The Chair thinks, therefore, the question will be most quickly and fairly disposed of by submitting to the committee whether they will receive this amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin or not.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 50, noes 72.

Mr. POUND. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the amendment was not received.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For support of the Tonkawa Indians at Fort Griffin, Texas, $2,000.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I offer as a substitute for the paragraph just read the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the sum of $2,500 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the benefit of the Tonkawa Indians, now at the military post at Fort Griffin, Texas; that the money herein appropriated shall be expended for the benefit of such Indians by the commanding officer at Fort Griffin, under such directions as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs: Provided, That no part of such fund shall be applied to the removal of said Indians from the vicinity of such military post to any Indian reservation: And provided further, That such appropriation shall be applied pro rata to such Lipan Indians as may have heretofore been incorporated into the Tonkawa tribe, and which still reside with such tribe.

Mr. SPARKS. I make the point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. SPARKS. My point of order is that there is an increase of $500 for which there is no law, and it is not in the interest of economy.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Before the gentleman makes the point of order, I ask that he will at least hear me while I state the reasons why I offer the amendment.

Mr. SPARKS. I am willing to hear the gentleman, of course.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. The bill makes a distinct appropriation for the Tonkawa Indians. This amendment increases that particular appropriation. If there be any law authorizing this appropriation at all, it is in order for the committee to now increase it.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I think the Chair is perfectly right in overruling the point of order; and I beg the committee to hear me state the reasons why I ask the increase of appropriation. I am quite satisfied if the committee understood the condition of those Indians and their situation they would not hesitate in agreeing with me in opinion on this subject. These Indians are not within any reservation provided by the Government for Indian tribes. They are Indians that belonged to Texas from the earliest settlement or knowledge of that country. They never have been at enmity with the white race. In all the Indian wars of Texas in the Southwest these Indians have always been on the side of the white people. Before the late war, the Federal Government removed these Indians to the reservation that was then at Fort Cobb, in the Indian Territory.

From the fact that these Indians have always been upon the side of the white people in the various wars with the Indian tribes, the Indians on the reservation at Fort Cobb in 1860 or 1861 made an attack upon these Tonkawa Indians and almost entirely destroyed them. After a fight of two days, there were less than one hundred and fifty left of a once powerful tribe. If there were no other reason than the fact that they have always been upon the side of the white people in the Indian wars, they ought to be taken care of. The remnant of the tribe fled from their reservation at Fort Cobb to Texas, and they were supported by the people of Texas until three years ago when Congress made an appropriation of $2,000 for their support. At the last session they made an appropriation of $2,500 in the precise form in which my amendment is drawn. It is the identical provision cut from the bill of last year. These Indians are far from the reservations and no provision has been made to school their children or to give them any of the advantages which are given to other tribes. I propose that the appropriation shall be increased $500 and then I shall offer a further amendment that that $500 shall be used for the purpose of purchasing not less than one hundred and sixty acres of land near a military post where the Indians can be located and can improve themselves in agriculture, &c.

I would say further that a few warriors belonging to this tribe have been since the war employed as scouts and trailers for the Army. They cannot go upon any of the Indian reservations because they have been at war for years with the wild tribes and they are obliged to remain in the white settlements or near a military post for protection. I hope, therefore, the committee will accept the amendment.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. How many of these Indians are there? Mr. THROCKMORTON. One hundred and thirty according to the last census reported by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. An additional appropriation of $500 would buy them one hundred and sixty acres of land, and in that way they can be located near a military post, and raise stock and make a subsistence for themselves. You have provided in one of the provisions immediately preceding this that Indians who have been in hostility to the Government shall be removed to reservations and provided with a home, and I trust the committee will adopt the amendment.

Mr. SPARKS. The point of order I made was certainly good, and I think the Chair would think so, if he would hear me upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly the Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. SPARKS. This appropriation is not based upon any treaty or any law governing this subject. There was an appropriation last year and the year preceding for this tribe, and it is called in the Book of Estimates an appropriation, but it is not stated to be under treaty or law. There is none. It is a gratuity, a gift, and we propose to give them this year $2,000. Hence I presume that the appropriation in the bill would be subject to a point of order. It is not based upon any law or treaty, but if that point is not made, and I suppose it will not be made by the gentleman from Texas, and he proposes to increase the appropriation, I make the point of order that it is not founded on existing law, and increases expenditures in place of being in the direction of economy. That is all I have to say.

Mr. CLYMER. I desire to be heard one moment on the point of order. The practice is that when appropriation bills are referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union points of order are usually reserved, but I believe that was not the case in reference to this bill; hence the point of order could not be made upon any provision inserted in the bill by the committee to make donations of this kind. The point of order could not be made upon the provisions of the bill unless points of order had been reserved, and that not being the case the provision inserted by the committee is not subject to the point of order; but the uniform practice has been that if an attempt is made to increase the amount of such appropriation the increase is liable to a point of order.

Mr. REAGAN. There is already an appropriation in the bill of $2,000 for these Tonkawa Indians. Last year an appropriation of $2,500 was made for this tribe. I submit that the increase of an appropriation already in the bill is not subject to a point of order, for, if it were so, then the action of the Committee on Appropriations would be conclusive on the House, which cannot be permitted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to say that there is no rule which makes the increase of an appropriation out of order. There are two general rules in regard to amendments; one is that amendments must be germane, and the other that they shall not change existing law. There is a further provision which permits amendments which do change existing law and which would therefore be out of order, provided they reduce expenses—

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. This amendment does change existing law. It provides for new legislation that has not heretofore existed.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending amendment would be out of order provided it changes existing law; but the committee have introduced a clause upon the very subject to which the amendment relates, making provision for these identical Indians, and the amendment is certainly germane to that provision; it increases the amount from $2,000 to $2,500. Now the Chair understands the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BAKER] to say that because there is no law for the appropriation recommended by the committee the amendment must be ruled out, although the recommendation may be acted on. Is the Chair right in so understanding the objection of the gentleman?

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. The Chair will pardon me. The amendment not only proposes to raise the amount reported by the Committee on Appropriations from $2,000 to $2,500, but it goes on and makes specific directions as to how this money shall be disbursed; provides for the purchase of land for these Indians, and for placing them under the control of the War Office.

The CHAIRMAN. If that be so, the portion of the amendment directing how the appropriation shall be expended would be out of order, but not the mere increase of the amount appropriated. The point of order raised by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] that the amendment increases the amount appropriated will be first ruled upon by the Chair. The Chair thinks that where a committee introduces a bill into this House making an appropriation, when the House comes to consider the bill, whether the appropriation recommended by the committee be authorized by existing law or not, it is within the power of the committee to increase the amount proposed to be appropriated. If they can act on the subject at all, they can act on the amounts proposed. The Chair therefore thinks that the amendment is not out of order on the ground that it proposes to increase the amount recommended to be appropriated. As to the objection now raised by the gentleman from Indiana to the other part of the amendment, that it changes existing law in the limitation which it puts upon the method of expending the appropriation, the Chair would be glad to hear from the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I cut this amendment from the law of last year.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. That which the gentleman styles the law of last year was simply an appropriation which expires by its own terms at the expiration of the fiscal year.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. The gentleman from Indiana is mistaken in regard to my amendment relating to the purchase of land. I said that if this amendment should be adopted I had another which I propose to offer, directing that the additional $500 should be expended in the purchase of land.

I will state another thing to the committee. I have not the law before me, but I will state that these Indians were included in treaties made with them by the United States before the late civil war. They were then removed with various other Indian tribes from Texas to the agency at Fort Cobb. They were at that agency at the time the late war began, and at the time they were driven out from there by the other Indians. They went back into Texas and have been taken care of by the people and State of Texas since that time, and no attention was called to them until about three years ago. Then for the first time since the war an appropriation was asked for them.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee on Appropriations having brought in an appropriation of $2,000 for the Tonkawa Indians, the gentleman from Texas moves to increase the amount to $2,500 and to place a limitation upon its expenditure. The Chair holds that the amendment so far as it proposes to increase the appropriation is in order. In reference to the limitation upon its expenditure the Chair is not informed in regard to what the law is in reference to the restriction upon the appropriation. He will therefore give the committee the benefit of the doubt and rule the amendment in order.

The question was taken upon the amendment moved by Mr. THROCKMORTON; and upon a division there were—ayes 22, noes 48.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. THROCKMORTON and Mr. SPARKS were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 34, noes 70.

No further count being called for, the amendment was not agreed to. Mr. THROCKMORTON. I will move as a substitute for the clause under consideration the amendment which has just been rejected changing the amount from $2,500 to $2,000.

Mr. SPARKS. I have no objection to that; it is the same that was in the last Indian appropriation bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

Payment to Flatheads removed to Jocko reservation, Montana:

For six of ten installments of $50,000, to be expended under the direction of the President, for the Flathead Indians removed from Bitter Root Valley to the Jocko reservation, in the Territory of Montana, $5,000.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I move to amend the paragraph just read by inserting that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That this amount shall be divided equally between those Indians who have removed to the Jocko reservation and those who remain in the Bitter Root Valley, if in the judgment of the President such division is consistent with existing obligations to said Indians.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I would like to explain this amendment for a moment. At the time the original treaty was made with the Indians in the Bitter Root Valley there was an additional reservation for the Flathead and other tribes. Some of the Indians settled in the Bitter Root Valley and some on the Jocko reservation. In order to settle the dispute between the Indians and the whites a commission was appointed in 1872, of which General Garfield was the head—I do not know but what he was the whole of the commission—to endeavor to get the Indians to give up their lands in the Bitter Root Valley and to remove to the Jocko reservation. A contract was made with them for that purpose, but only some seven families out of fifty-seven removed to Jocko. This money was paid these Indians for their land in the Bitter Root Valley. In order if possible to get the whole tribe to remove to the Jocko Valley this proviso was put in the first appropriation bill:

And provided further, That no part of said sum shall be paid to any Indian of said tribe who shall not have settled upon the Jocko reservation.

Now, this $50,000 for the lands of these Indians belongs to all these Indians whether they come on the Jocko reservation or not. Up to this time only some seven or eight families have settled over on the Jocko, and they get all the $50,000. The other Indians under Chief Charley still live in the Bitter Root Valley. When the Nez Percés, their relatives, came over into that valley, although they felt injured by the giving of all this money to the other families of their tribe, Chief Charley and his Indians remained loyal to the United States. I have investigated this matter and I trust the House will see the justice of the amendment which I have proposed. It is all left to the discretion of the President, and I think the amendment should be adopted as a matter of justice to the Indians.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would not, for one, consent to this amendment at all if it could be construed into a violation of any treaty made with these Indians. It was considered very important at the time that the whole of this tribe should go on to the Jocko reservation. They were permitted by the Stevens treaty to remain in the Bitter Root Valley only temporarily until some permanent reservation could be established for them. When at last the Jocko reservation was selected and made their permanent residence, it was their duty under former treaties to go there.

Mr. MAGINNIS. But the law allowed such as chose to remain to take up homesteads in the Bitter Root Valley.

Mr. GARFIELD. Of course, I speak of them as a tribe. When I visited that tribe in 1872, under the direction of the President, for the purpose of negotiating their removal, I found this man Charley, the chief of the tribe, to be a very intelligent and enterprising man, and I found that down at the bottom of his feeling in this matter was a very strong desire to remain where his ancestors had lived—a feeling creditable to him. He was unwilling to leave that place, even for large pecuniary advantages. He gave up all his legal rights, I suppose, in the treaty except his right to take up a farm for himself in the Bitter Root Valley. But while he may have no legal claim on this $5,000 a year, yet he and those with him in the Bitter Root Valley behaved so splendidly in the late Indian hostilities (he telling the other Indians that if they undertook to interfere with the whites at all he would himself join the whites and fight his own brethren) that if the President can find it consistent with the treaties to do what is here suggested, and pay Charley and his portion of the band remaining in the Bitter Root Valley a share of this money, I shall be very glad to see it done. For this reason I hope that the pending proposition, which is permissive only, will be allowed to pass.

I want to say a single other word on this subject. This tribe of Flathead Indians from the days when Lewis and Clarke in 1804 passed through that country on the grandest of American explorations, have been found not only very bright and intelligent but an exceedingly kind-hearted, generous people. They received Lewis and Clarke like old friends. It is the boast of that tribe that they have never slain a white man, have never been hostile to the white people. They are on the average far more intelligent than most of the Indians of that country. They live in one of the loveliest valleys I have ever seen; and I really do not blame them for desiring to remain there. It seems a little hard that those who from love of the old place stay by it and neglect to go to the reservation should get no part of this money. I think the amendment should prevail.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I have made a point of order that the proposed amendment changes existing law and is not in the interest of economy. In reference to that point I wish to say that the agreement known as the "Garfield agreement," made on the 27th of August, 1872, for the purpose of inducing these Flathead Indians to remove from the Bitter Root Valley and settle in proximity to the Indian agents, was signed by only a portion of the Indians. As stated in the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs—

Charles, the son of Victor, and hereditary chief of the tribe, chose not to sign the agreement, and still resides in the Bitter Root Valley, where he cultivates the soil and refuses to leave the home of his fathers. The whole Flathead tribe, consisting of nearly four hundred souls, with the exception of the few families who removed to this agency, adhere to Charles and follow his fortunes, choosing rather to eke out a livelihood by their own exertions in the neighborhood of their venerated chief than to accept the bounty of the Government and leave their homes.

The Flatheads who have removed to the agency are alone entitled by the terms of the treaty to participate in this fund. I believe that the provision of the existing law forbidding the payment of any of this money to these Indians unless they settle at the agency is a wise one. It ought to be the policy of this Government to settle all the Indians of this country at agencies having known and fixed limits. I insist on the point of order.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I wish to say a word on the point of order. I insist that any provision of law which does not increase appropriations and which has a tendency to do justice to a loyal and worthy tribe of Indians, and probably prevent a long and expensive war, is decidedly in the interest of economy. And I beg to call the attention of the chairman to this point: that while the facts are as stated by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BAKER,] those Indians were authorized by law to take up homesteads in the Bitter Root Valley; and if this money, the common proceeds of their common lands, belongs to these Indians, it is not right to say to them "You shall not have it unless you give up your homes and remove to an Indian reservation." I cannot see that the amendment will do any harm.

Mr. SPARKS. Why, sir, I can see that the amendment may do all the harm in the world. It will allow refractory bands of Indians to receive the same as those who obey and stand by the agreement. I understand the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to concede the fact that according to the agreement these Indians were to remove to the Jocko reservation, and if they did so were to receive $5,000. Now, some pretty good Indians have refused to remove; yet if we give this $5,000 to all alike, how do we treat the faithful Indians who have kept their agreement? Most of these Indians have refused to go; so that those remaining in the Bitter Root Valley would receive the greater part of this appropriation, while those who have been faithful to the agreement would be in a great measure cut off.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Allow me to call the gentleman's attention for one moment—

Mr. SPARKS. If I am wrong in my statement, of course I desire to be corrected.

Mr. MAGINNIS. It simply says if in the judgment of the President it is in accordance with the provision of the treaty.

Mr. SPARKS. Precisely. Now, the last appropriation was exactly like this, and it has been up to this hour recognized: that portion of the Indians who have removed to the reservation according to the agreement and are upon it shall receive this money. It is within the power of those who have not removed to get their share as soon as they do remove to the reservation in accordance with the terms of the agreement. That is all there is of it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would not make it obligatory upon the President.

The CHAIRMAN. The portion of the bill proposed to be amended provides for the payment of the sixth installment of $50,000 to be expended for the Flathead Indians removed from Bitter Root Valley to the Jocko reservation in the Territory of Montana. The treaty providing for the payment provides that it shall be made only to the Indians upon their removal. It would obviously be a change of existing law to provide in this bill that a portion of the money so due should go to those who had not removed to the reservation. The amendment, therefore, is subject to the point of order that it changes existing law and must be ruled out unless it can be regarded as reducing expenditure. The gentleman from Montana Territory insists this amendment will prevent an Indian war and therefore is in the line of retrenchment. That possible result does not bring it within the terms of the rule. In the judgment of the Chair it must appear from the face of the amendment itself that it relates to amounts or otherwise tends directly to reduce expenditures. Therefore the amendment cannot on that ground be ruled to be in order.

The amendment further provides that the payment shall be made at the discretion of the President, should he find it in accordance with existing law. But since, according to the statement of the gentleman from Indiana, which is not disputed, the existing law does not authorize the payment, to give the President power to make an unauthorized payment provided he should think it authorized would not make the amendment in order. The Chair is therefore constrained to rule the amendment out of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Incidental expenses of Indian service in Washington: For general incidental expenses of the Indian service and pay of employees and the support and civilization of Indians at Colville and Nisqually agencies, $20,000.

Mr. SPARKS. I move in line 1465 to add the following:

Provided, That the sum of $1,000 of said appropriation shall be applied to the support of a school for the Cœur d'Alène Indians in Idaho, attached by executive order to the Colville agency.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKS. I yield now, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MONROE] who wishes to make a statement.

Mr. MONROE. Mr. Chairman, while the reading of this bill was going on I received at the door a card from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, which was handed to me because at the moment he could not reach the chairman of the committee. This card contains a proposition for a further reduction of the expenses for Indian affairs to the amount of $3,100, a net reduction of that amount. As it is somewhat unusual for the heads of bureaus to pursue us into this Hall in order to get the total appropriations for their bureaus reduced, I think the proposition is worthy of a moment's unanimous attention from this Committee of the Whole.

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs says, in substance, on the card I hold in my hand, that he became convinced, on further inquiry and investigation this morning and upon meeting an inspector who had returned, I believe, from the West, that the Dakota superintendency of Indian affairs could be dispensed with; and hence he proposes there shall be no appropriation in this bill for either the superintendent or his clerk, or for incidental expenses for that superintendency for the coming fiscal year. This will reduce the amount appropriated in this bill $2,000 for the salary of the superintendent, $1,200 for the salary of his clerk, and $800 for incidental expenses for the Dakota superintendency, making a total of $4,000. But the Commissioner also proposes that the committee shall consent to restore the salaries of the three inspectors to the amount which they now receive. This bill reduces these salaries from $3,000 to $2,700, making a saving of $300 on the salary of each inspector, or an aggregate saving of $900. That amount deducted from $4,000 of reduction makes a net saving of $3,100.

Mr. SPARKS. I wish to say to my friend from Ohio, of course I cannot accept for the Committee on Appropriations the amendments he suggests, but so far as I am concerned I agree with him. I think the abolition of the superintendency of Indian affairs at Dakota would impose additional duties upon these inspectors and believe their salaries ought to be increased to the amount they now receive. So that I agree thoroughly with what the gentleman from Ohio suggests, though I cannot accept his amendment on the part of the committee as I have no authority to do so. Personally I agree to it. The proposition of the gentleman, as I understand, is to strike out the appropriation for the Dakota superintendent and his clerk, amounting to $3,200—

Mr. MONROE. And incidental expenses.

Mr. SPARKS. Yes, and incidental expenses—making $800 more; and then to add $300 to the salary of each of three inspectors. I think it is a good suggestion and concur in it.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. Would it not be a good suggestion to make this reduction without at the same time increasing the salaries of the inspectors?

Mr. MONROE. No. These three inspectors, the Commissioner informs me, are the great safeguards of the Government against fraud in this department. The department wants men of the highest character and intelligence for that position and generally has them. These three men have to inspect all the transactions of the Indian department. They examine contracts; they inspect supplies; they visit Indian agencies; they take this whole responsibility of the protection of the Government against dishonesty and fraud upon themselves. They have been paid $3,000 for this service. This bill proposes to reduce this salary to $2,700. The Commissioner wishes the salaries to be restored to $3,000. I ask unanimous consent to go back and offer the amendments which I have indicated.

There was no objection.

Mr. MONROE. I now move to amend by striking out lines 8, 9, 10, 11, as follows:

For pay of one superintendent of Indian affairs for the tribes in Dakota, $2,000.
For pay of one clerk for the Dakota superintendency, $1,200.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. MONROE. I offer the following amendment:

In lines 218 and 219 strike out "$2,700" and insert "$3,000," and strike out "$3,100" and insert "$3,000;" so it will read:

For pay of three Indian inspectors, at $3,000 per annum each, $9,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONROE. I offer the following amendment:

In line 1455 strike out "$15,000" and insert "$14,200;" so that it will read: "Incidental expenses of Indian service in Dakota: For general incidental expenses of the Indian service and pay of employes, $14,200."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I ask unanimous consent to go back to lines 47 and 49 of the bill and transfer the amount $1,800 from the Crow agency to the Blackfeet agency and the amount $2,200 from the Blackfeet agency to the Crow agency; so that it will read:

At the Blackfeet agency, at $1,800;

At the Crow agency, at $2,200.

Mr. SPARKS. I have examined this matter, and I think that amendment ought to be made.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. SPARKS. I move that the committee rise and report the bill. The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POTTER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 4549) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. SPARKS. I move the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question will be first on the amendments, and if there be no separate vote demanded the Chair will submit the question upon the amendments in gross.

No separate vote was demanded.

The amendments were concurred in. The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SPARKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. EDEN in the chair,) and proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 4104) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Chairman, the bill before the committee contains the vitalizing elements of the Government and in a large degree represents the measure of the nation's power, extent, and authority. The Government, sovereign in all the extent of its powers exercised within their constitutional spheres, without money, must sooner or later fail in the execution of its functions. Revenue, therefore, is its mainspring, and its appropriation is that power in action by which its whole machinery is operated and its prerogatives enforced. Its consideration, then, very properly and logically suggests the whole range of subjects of political economy connected with our finances, taxation, and expenditures, and particularly where the delicate right and power of taxation are lodged by the Constitution.

At a later stage of my remarks I will take a glance at these general subjects. For the present I shall confine myself to the points in this bill which distinguish it from the present appropriation law. The reduction in this bill below the present law has been reached by reclassification and administrative changes and the abolition of a few offices rather than by the general scaling of salaries. I invite the attention of the Committee of the Whole to the following comparison: This bill foots up $14,735,670, being $682,263.33 less than the law of 1876-77, and $714,875.30 less than the present law. It is also less than the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act of the last session of the Forty-third Congress by the large sum of $4,166,566.93. And it is less than the same act passed the last session of the Forty-second Congress by the still larger sum of $6,048,230.80.

The first consideration which challenged the attention of the Committee on Appropriations, and which now appeals to the sober judgment of this House in the action it is about to take on this the most important appropriation bill, is, whether the Government's expenditures shall be kept within the revenues and appropriations made to meet the demands of the public necessities or whether we shall launch upon a scale of extravagance to satisfy the wants of the artificial tastes of the admirers of a "high-mounted" government, and thus force the Treasury into a state of bankruptcy and endanger the credit of the Government.

The Secretary of the Treasury informs the country, in his annual report to this House on the 1st of December last, that there was on June 30, 1877, a deficit of $3,389,225.51 in the Treasury after discharging the amount due to the sinking fund, which was $33,729,833.20. He has likewise made an estimate of the probable revenues for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, approximating the probable sum of $265,500,000. He also estimates for the whole service, ordinary and extraordinary, for the same fiscal year, amounting to $233,430,643.72, which leaves a surplus revenue of $33,069,356.28. After discharging the amount due the sinking fund, which is $35,424,804.80, there will be a deficit on this account of $2,355,448.52. The estimated revenue for 1879 is $269,250,000 and the estimated expenditures are $280,688,796.38. The estimate for the sinking fund for that year is $37,196,045.04, which leaves a deficiency at the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, of $11,438,796.38. The honorable Secretary is frank enough to admonish the House that we must fall in our appropriation bills below his estimates over $11,000,000. I am sorry that he did not present us estimates gauged to the standard of the revenues, since he admits that the estimates are at least $11,000,000 too high.

If the Secretaries, heads of bureaus, chiefs of divisions, and chief clerks in the civil Departments of this Government, who are or should be intimately acquainted with all of the intricate and abstruse machinery of Government, cannot or do not, or what is worse, will not inform the committee where its extravagances are, point out its supernumerary officers and employes, indicate its useless officers and the very many abuses that need correction—if, in a word, the departmental officials do not enter with your committee heartily and patriotically into the good work of retrenchment and reform, the labor of your committee, thus unaided, can be but partially and imperfectly done, let their efforts be ever so industrious and searching. And without intending to prefer a wholesale indictment against the entire administration, for that would be unjust, as some of the officials have shown a commendable disposition to exhibit the internal workings of their particular offices, and to ascertain what reforms could be safely made, it is but too true that very little advantage has accrued to this committee in the way of retrenchment by suggestions from these officials, with a few noteworthy exceptions.

ECONOMY OR INCREASED TAXATION.

Now there is no disguising the issue. The frankness of the Secretary of the Treasury forces upon this House the decision of either practicing rigid economy or of increasing the burden of taxes upon the people, now made desperate by the ruinous policy of contraction and the class legislation of the last decade, which has made the rich richer and the poor poorer.

In periods of great pecuniary distress it is a safe maxim for individuals to live within their means. It is a good maxim at any time. It is, in my judgment, equally wise in governments to do the same thing. Whatever the advocates of liberal and magnificent appropriations for public works and highly salaried officers may claim of the world's éclat, and however pleasant it may be to receive the flattery of the interested jobber and his coterie of satellites for having by one's vote lavished not one's own, but the people's money upon objects uselessly and extravagantly, like Gil Blas and Signor Manuel Ordonnez, who got rich by administering the funds of the poor, no patriot will deny that a deep sense of mortification and national shame would be felt over the announcement that our country's Treasury is bankrupt. Hence it should be the polar star of your Finance Committee, seconded by a frugal and discreet economy upon the part of the appropriating power, never to allow the budget of expenditures to exceed the sum of the revenues, in other words, always to preserve intact the surplus fund. That it is now in great danger of extinction, we have only to read the report of the Secretary of the Treasury as already intimated. To this I will again recur.

I will briefly mention certain general principles which have guided the committee in casting this bill; not that we have found it practicable in every instance to conform to the principle, for exceptional cases cannot be so compromised and will demand independent consideration and action. These exceptions will, I trust, commend themselves to the just judgment of this House. First, then, wherever a consolidation could be made without injury to either interest—as, for instance, following the example in the last Congress in the case of the Divisions of Loans and Currency, we have combined the Division of Loans with the Treasurer's Office, and we have consolidated the bureau of the Fourth Auditor with that of the Second, and that of the Fifth with the First, dispensing with the Fourth and Fifth Auditors and their respective deputies. These consolidations, we have the best of reasons to believe, can be made without injury to the public service. The duties of the Fourth Auditor relate almost entirely to the Navy, and their accounts can be just as well attended to by the Second Auditor, who now has in part charge of Army matters. In the case of the Fifth Auditor, by reference to the appropriations for this bureau it will be seen that there has been for a number of years a decline both in the force and the amount appropriated, and it is fair to suppose that there is a diminution in the business of the bureau. In the Second Assistant Postmaster-General's bureau we have consolidated the Division of Equipment with that of Inspection. We have abolished the office of chief clerk to the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, one of the heads of division acting in that capacity as well without inconvenience.

We have tried to eliminate from the service all supernumerary and war appointments that have thus far lingered superfluously upon the public Treasury that it is practicable to reach or that the country would justify. With this view we have reduced but have not entirely abolished the Bureau of Military Justice, leaving the Judge-Advocate at its head and two clerks. This bureau might have been very necessary during the war when the Army numbered hundreds of thousands of men, but when reduced to a peace footing the committee fail to see more need for it now than there was before the war. The military establishment was conducted then very successfully without this bureau; true, we had less red tape in those days but quite as much efficiency. The Military Committee two years ago and now advise its discontinuance as a useless, inconvenient, and expensive mode of enforcing obedience and discipline in the Army. Under this head the office of naval solicitor may be classed, which is abolished by this bill. It is difficult to see what necessity there can be for such an officer in view of the well-organized Department of Justice, with the Attorney-General at its head and a corps of skilled assistants, upon whom the responsibility of able and just interpretations of the laws devolve. The decisions of a subordinate could not be accepted as final; nor would it be sound policy thus to divide responsibility between the Attorney-General and one of inferior grade, although confined to naval matters.

Under this rule I doubt not, if the facts could be known to this House, as they are known to officers in the different Departments, there would be a long list of dead heads that would fall into the official waste basket. Thirty years ago Mr. Benton said that one-half of the expenditures of this Government could be abolished without injury to the service. That may not be literally true to-day, and yet no fact is better known than that our civil service needs reformation, especially in the reduction of clerical force. It is not possible that this Government needs over ninety thousand civil officers to conduct its affairs. Reform is not likely to be accomplished under the present party management. The mistake lies at the very threshold of this Administration. In a large measure the Cabinet ministers have all undertaken to keep in office the same chiefs and heads of bureaus and other leading officers that they found in when they took charge of their respective portfolios. They did this in conformity to that much-talked-of civil-service reform order of Mr. Hayes, which, as applied to the men to whom I refer, it would have been greatly better for the purification of the public service if it had been more honored in the breach than in the observance. Some of these officers are not willing to point out where the service can be reformed or expenditures retrenched. Extravagance has become the normal condition of their administrations, and hence they protest against any changes. Formerly, in many instances, the laws solemnly enacted were openly and flagrantly violated with impunity until many officials came to look upon the resolves and laws of Congress as possessing no greater sanctity or authority than the orders of a town council or the address of a chamber of commerce. Lest I may not be regarded as reckless in my statement, let me refer the House to section 162 of the Revised Statutes, which recites the hours of labor for the Departments, and then to ask the question if it is enforced in a single Department or bureau in this city, and I answer emphatically, no! The clerks and employés and laborers of the Departments work only seven hours a day, while the men who are employed to labor on public works and in private enterprises toil ten hours per day at less wages than the laborer of the Departments gets for seven hours' work, or mere attendance, as the case may be.

VIOLATION OF LAW BY THE DEPARTMENTS.

I will be pardoned for adverting to another matter in which I am sure there is a failure upon the part of some of the Departments. Section 193 of the Revised Statutes reads as follows:

The head of each Department shall make an annual report to Congress, giving a detailed statement of the manner in which the contingent fund for his Department, and for the bureaus and offices therein, has been expended, giving the names of every person to whom any portion thereof has been paid; and if for anything furnished, the quantity and price; and if for any service rendered, &c.

The object of that law is to enable Congress to supervise with accuracy and precision all expenditures of the moneys of the Government by the officials, appropriated under the indefinite head of contingent and miscellaneous. A strict conformity to that law would operate as a powerful check to extravagance and corruption. Is it strictly obeyed? Again, section 194 of the Revised Statutes requires that—

The head of each Department shall make an annual report to Congress of the names of the clerks and other persons that have been employed in his Department and the offices thereof; stating the time that each clerk or other person was actually employed, and the sums paid to each; also, whether they have been usefully employed; whether the services of any of them can be dispensed with without detriment to the public service, and whether the removal of any individuals, and the appointment of others in their stead, is required for the better dispatch of business.

Is there a single Department in the Government that ever pretends to comply with the requirements of that law? Is there one? I do not believe there is. I do not hesitate to express my belief that, if that law were complied with, a considerable reduction could be made in all of the Departments in the clerical force and other employes. I believe the enforcement of that law and of section 162 regulating the hours of labor would enable the Departments to do the public business with 33 per cent. less force, quite as efficiently as it is now done, and of course at greatly less cost. It may seem ungracious to mention those things, but when I know so many people in this country who labor from year's end to year's end for less than $1 per day, I cannot acquit my conscience without reference to it.

Congress requires that no appropriation for a specific purpose shall be expended for another and a different object, and yet this law is not invariably observed. On the contrary, it has been often violated.

These derelictions and violations of law were boldly charged upon the late administration in the Navy Department. Worse still, contracts were made with personal and party favorites amounting to millions of dollars without even authority of law. The same is true in the management of the affairs in this District. The remedy for all this rests with the people at the ballot-box. Nothing less than rigid accountability for our stewardship to the people will secure reform.

EQUALIZATION OF SALARIES.

Again, we have, as far as we have been able, equalized the salaries of officers of cognate duties and of like degree. The committee is well aware that on this point they are trenching upon disputed territory. There are instances in the officers of this House and in the different Departments which deserve equalization of salaries, there being already an equality of duties or service. But the most glaring inequality in salaries and disproportion in service of officers of equal rank is to be found in the force employed by the Senate, as well as in their greatly enlarged force in proportion to the relative numbers in each body. This bill seeks to equalize that difference both in respect to salaries and the number of force employed. The reduction in the regular clerical force in the Senate is only eleven and the increase in the House is only six. The Senate has yet greatly the advantage in proportion to numbers.

In reference to salaries I may be permitted to say that the committee has not undertaken to travel over much of the ground unsuccessfully undertaken in the Forty-fourth Congress. Quite a large number of salaries were reduced by the last Congress, and many were attempted but the reduction failed. In this bill we have reduced the salaries of officers in a few instances which were in excess of amounts received by other officers of the same rank and dignity to the level of the lower sums. In the case of messengers of this House and like officers of the Senate we have increased moderately the salaries of those few doing annual service and decreased in the same proportion those employed only for or during the actual terms of the sessions of Congress, of which there is a large number. In the matter of the host of messengers and laborers in the Departments, we have increased the number, but diminished the salaries and wages, thus affording employment to a greater number.

The committee have introduced into departmental service a new feature, to wit, the employment of pages at $40 per month in lieu of the same number of assistant messengers, which we doubt not will work equally well for the public, and at the same time cost the Government less and afford more relief to a greater number of needy people. We abolished the office of messenger in the Departments altogether. It was thought by that means a greater force could be employed for the same money if the requirements of the service demand it, and accordingly have slightly increased the force of assistant messengers and pages and laborers. The committee have likewise graduated the number of the higher class clerks to the lower classes, thus reducing the number of the higher classes and increasing the number of the first class and the more subordinate classes, and have provided for a one-thousand-dollar class. In most instances the difference in compensation of the higher classes above the lower is much greater than their service or qualifications are superior to those who fill the lower class. Hence we have scaled the number downward, leaving the salaries of the different classes the same as now fixed by the law of 1853. There is no hardship in this to any one, as employment is voluntary. The Government should only be required to pay in proportion to the service rendered. Except to equalize salaries and services of cognate offices, the committee have avoided entering to any great extent upon the consideration of the general reduction of salaries, as the whole subject has been so fully and elaborately discussed in the Forty-third and the last Congress. The committee think that the great error lies in the excessive numbers over the real requirements of the service, but how to ascertain who are supernumeraries is the insoluble perplexity.

The salaries of assistant messengers and laborers under the law are the same. No one will deny that the position of assistant messenger requires some more responsibility and a greater degree of intelligence than is necessary for an ordinary departmental laborer, whose principal duty is to bring in fuel, sweep floors, and cultivate a few ornamental shrubs and flowers. It seems to me that $600 is enough for that kind of labor. Really, the term laborer, as applied to all this class of employes, is a misnomer. Their duties do not amount to either labor of the head or of the hands. These departmental attachés called messengers and laborers do not represent labor in its broad and real meaning. When a man works the whole year at hard labor, as thousands of my constituents do for $200 per annum, and as men do in this city at $1.25 for ten hours, doing all kinds of manual work, I call that labor. These departmental laborers receive under this bill $600 for seven hours' so-called service that my constituents would call mere play.

The salaries of the privates of the Capitol police have been reduced from $1,100 to $1,000 each, the work being very light and subjecting the person to little or no exposure whatever.

The salary of the Solicitor-General in the Department of Justice is $7,500, almost as much as the Attorney-General's. This bill reduces that salary to $6,000, believing as we do that it is ample and ought to be satisfactory.

The salaries of the examiner and computer of bullion have each been slightly increased on the ground that $2,200 and $2,500 are not enough for the talent necessary to fill those places; this bill gives them each $2,500.

The secretary to the President to sign land patents is left out by this bill; also the stamp clerk at San Francisco; and the fractional-currency clerk, the registered-interest clerk, and the superintendent of the building at Philadelphia, are dispensed with.

Three years ago the Third Assistant Secretary of State was created. Part of the time there has been no incumbent, and there is none at this time. We are entirely persuaded that none is needed. There are at this time in the State Department five chiefs of bureaus, and we are satisfied that three are ample to effectually perform the service required. The salaries of assistant examiners in the Patent-Office have been reduced because we believe, from the best information we can obtain, that neither the nature nor extent of their duties justifies the excess now allowed them over other clerical force.

The bill transfers from the permanent appropriations the provisions for the payment of the salaries and other expenses of the southern claims commission to the list of the annual appropriations, and reduces the salaries of the commissioners from $5,000 each to $4,000, besides reducing the contingent expenses and other salaries in the aggregate about $7,000. This was done for the reason that this tribunal is not equal in rank and dignity or responsibility with the Court of Claims, whose judges receive $4,500 each.

The committee concur in the general reduction to the legal minimum of the number of territorial councilmen and representatives and reduce their per diem from six to four dollars. The maximum number of councilmen is thirteen and there are twenty-seven representatives, except in Washington Territory where the representatives are thirty. And in all of the other Territories, with one exception, I believe, the maximum number is adopted. The committee are of the opinion that territorial legislators should not be better paid than very many of the States pay their own senators and representatives, not being generally superior either in intelligence or other qualifications for the faithful discharge of representative duty, although they are generally very intelligent bodies of men no doubt. A like reduction has been made in the salaries of the clerks and other officers and employes and in the contingent expenses of the Territories, which were based upon inflation prices. I may be asked why the committee did not reduce the salaries of Senators and Representatives. I answer, because they have been reduced by the repeal of the act of the 3d of March, 1873, while those to which I refer have not yet been brought down. Besides, the Forty-third and Forty-fourth Congresses discussed the compensation of Senators and Representatives until the country was disgusted, and finally settled upon the old compensation, with which the people are entirely satisfied. The man who has the qualities of head and heart to represent the intelligence, majesty, dignity, and sovereignty of the people, who makes their laws and frames their institutions, ought to have talents that would command in the business walks of life more clear profit than the most economical and frugal Senator or Representative realizes out of his salary.

If, then, we have diminished some salaries and increased a few others and others again are left untouched, it has been done in obedience to the law of the adjustment of compensation to service. That there are some salaries too high I do not doubt, but as there is no reasonable hope of reduction as circumstances now exist, no time or effort has been wasted in what would be a fruitless attempt.

CHANGE OF ADMINISTRATION ESSENTIAL TO EFFECT COMPLETE CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM.

The time I hope will come when this whole subject can be intelligently and fairly investigated. That cannot be done until an entire administrative change shall take place. But that depends upon the will of the American people when they come to choose a Chief Magistrate. Without the co-operation of the Executive and the Departments Congress is powerless to perform a radical and thorough reform.

There is no doubt that there is great need of reform in our civil service, both in respect to the force employed and also to the compensation. The mighty army of officeholders and employes and agents pensioned upon the public Treasury is not only a heavy burden upon the people who supply them, but the effect upon the public mind in directing the attention of other hundreds and thousands to quit a better and more profitable business and to seek office as a means of support is not only demoralizing but injurious to the productive interests of the nation. There should be officers enough to discharge with facility and thoroughness the public functions of the Government at a rate of compensation which will enable them to maintain themselves and families comfortably. But the compensation should not so exceed the compensation of private avocations in ordinary business as to become a source of political emulation. If the salary of an office has sufficient profit above the ordinary expenses of such office as to excite general cupidity, it may be taken for granted that such salary will bear a reduction to the point below which this greed will not manifest itself. Of course salaries must vary in proportion to the talent required to perform the duties of the office, and in proportion to the dignity, importance, and responsibilities of the trust imposed. Hence it is proper that one salary should be greater than another.

Heretofore, the force employed for the executive office consisted, in part, in details from the different Departments and it was difficult to know the exact number of persons whose services were required. It was thought best to collect the entire force and appropriate directly the money necessary for the payment of the same, so that hereafter there would be no uncertainty as to that expenditure. We have done so in this bill; also provided in future for the exclusion of all details.

The provisions formerly made in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for the benefit of the District of Columbia have been eliminated from this bill and will be embraced along with the usual items for the District in the sundry civil appropriation bill. This is done that the whole subject of appropriations for the District of Columbia may be more easily seen and understood, thereby affording the popular mind at least greater facility in understanding just what Congress appropriates for each specific object, and showing in a compact form the general aggregate appropriated.

The committee had hoped to see effected a reform in the general system of permanent appropriations which would have enabled them to dispense with many supernumerary officers and agents. The tendency to increase the number of permanent appropriations and magnify the amount should be not only checked, but the whole system in my judgment should be abolished, except the annual interest on the public debt and the amount set aside for the sinking fund, unless it should be deemed wise policy to repeal the latter law or dispend temporarily with its enforcement under the present embarrassment of the Treasury. To these might be added the permanent appropriation for the Marine Hospital, being a fund which is accumulated by small monthly savings of the men, which belongs exclusively to the men, Government exercising no control over it except to preserve it from waste and destruction.

But all other objects of permanent appropriation should be made annual for the reason that a supervision given every year to these appropriations would lessen the opportunities for their abuse and misapplication. By giving to them through proper agents, an annual inspection, a stricter and more correct account of them will be rendered to the Treasury Department, necessarily preventing many frauds and much extravagance which the present system of permanent appropriation is well calculated to foster and promote. There are about $143,000,000 annually expended under this head and distributed to forty-two different objects.

It is believed that this permanent system superinduces negligence and irresponsibility in the disbursement of so large a sum of money, which must lead to extravagance, waste, and possibly corruption. The largest item, being four-fifths of the whole amount, comes under the head of interest on the public debt. That was made permanent that assurance might be given to the holders of Government securities of the prompt payment of interest as fast as it accrued. That and the Marine Hospital fund should constitute the only exceptions to the abolition of the whole system. The sum of $5,500,000 for the expenses of collecting the customs revenue especially demands annual supervision. As this appropriation is removed from the immediate care of Congress ignorance of its administration to some extent necessarily follows. The responsibility is thrown upon the Treasury Department, and of course the same strict accountability is not rendered were the appropriation annually made from the Treasury by act of Congress.

EXTRAVAGANCE IN THE CUSTOMS SERVICE.

One of the abuses that loudly calls for correction in connection with this subject is in the expensive machinery connected with the collection of customs, in the large number of custom-houses and the very meager sums collected from many of them. There are to-day thirty-six custom-houses which collect less than $500 per annum, several less than $100, and a few less than $20. And yet large salaries and other expenditures are incurred aggregating far more than is realized from those offices. This evil should be remedied. The apology for it is that they are necessary to prevent smuggling. There is force in the suggestion. But could not all the machinery involving so much expense be dispensed with, and a single officer, an inspector or watchman, be left on guard at each custom-house to detect and report smugglers to the nearest collector. By this means a large sum could be saved and there would be no corresponding loss of the revenue by illicit importations. Reform in this direction should be led by the able Committee of Ways and Means and will doubtless receive attention as soon as time will allow.

AN ONEROUS TARIFF.

Returning to the consideration of the surplus fund and the laws governing the condition of the Treasury, it is a fact that under the operations of the highest tariff known to our laws, a tariff from which the advocates predicted the most overflowing Treasury, the statistics show a constant decline of customs revenue and the deficit has been remedied by a resort to a burdensome system of excises upon American labor and industry. Agriculture, the noblest and the surest of all pursuits, has been made to bear the burden of government in an unequal and unjust degree, which a ruinous financial policy, harnessed to a decaying system of impost duties, has inflicted upon the country and is simply disastrous in its consequences, baffling all description. No parallel in all history equals the wide-spread apprehension which now threatens general financial disaster and bankruptcy, both to people and Government, unless it be at the close of the first quarter of the present century in England under the operation of similar laws and like causes which now so unhappily prevail in this country.

In but few instances in the history of the Government in time of peace has the surplus fund in the Treasury been totally absorbed until this instance, the immediate embarrassment of which is not felt because of the presence of the greater portion due the sinking fund and of the coin hoarded in the Treasury for resumption purposes. Each of these was preceded by a financial panic, which bowed for the time being every interest before it as with the fury of a tropical hurricane.

These panics were short lived, however, and were the result of a system of local banking without adequate guarantees to the note-holder and destitute of protection to the depositor, and in most instances were controlled by a spirit of gambling and reckless speculation, the sure precursors of irresponsibility and failure. This financial crisis does not result, like those referred to, from too much bad money, but from the opposite cause; from too little money at reasonable rates of interest, and from the unequal and unfair distribution of the circulation and other causes, which are drying up the resources of industry and labor and depleting private as well as public revenues. We are brought, unpleasant as it may be to acknowledge it, to confront the serious and embarrassing fact of constantly falling revenues. There were collected of duties in the following years the following amounts:

In 1852	$212,030,727
In 1853	184,556,045
In 1854	160,185,382
In 1855	154,271,805
In 1856	144,982,447
In 1857	128,427,243

In addition, the recent letter of the Secretary of the Treasury addressed to this House recites the suggestion of a considerable decline in the internal revenue, principally from whisky and tobacco; all of which tends to cloud our financial horoscope. It is also noticeable that the daily reports of customs and internal revenue are not published regularly as in former days, which is at least an unhealthy sign.

With the lesson of this admonition before the committee let us exhibit the courage to do one of two things: either to resolve bravely to restrict our expenditures within our revenues or, like men, boldly declare for an increase of taxes. In the British Parliament the financial budget, answering to our appropriation bills, is always attended by a money bill or tax measure; so that whenever an outlay of expenditures is resolved upon the corresponding responsibility of taxing the people accompanies it. Hence, the people are never insensible to the cost or effect of any proposition which gains the assent of Parliament and becomes the law of the realm. Our practice is very different. With us it not unfrequently, indeed generally, happens that one set of legislators imposes the burdens and another set provides ways and means for their payment, and at different periods. But with our disappearing surplus, unless we are prudent and careful, our expenditures must be provided for by ourselves by an increase of taxes. The very best that is reasonable to hope for will be a suspension of payment to the sinking fund, to effect which bills are now pending in both Houses of Congress. I confess that I would prefer the discontinuance of the annual payment or setting aside of that fund to any proposition looking to revenue by an increase of taxes either by customs or excises.

The sinking fund has been overpaid largely over $200,000,000 already, and it could be well suspended for a term of years without producing any shock to the public credit, and at the same time greatly relieve the grievous burden of taxation now wearily borne by the people. If the bugbear of resumption were banished from the calculations of the Secretary of the Treasury by a repeal, and the large sum, $65,000,000 to $80,000,000, claimed by the Secretary to be now in the Treasury and in process of collection, intended to meet the demands which the execution of that law requires by the 1st of January, 1879, could be let loose, so that it could be utilized for the current expenditures of the Government, there certainly would be no necessity for an abatement of the annual appropriation of the sinking fund or of a resort to further taxation in order to preserve a surplus after meeting all demands. On the contrary the internal revenue collected from two of the great industries of the country, to wit: whisky and tobacco, might be diminished. That the revenue would be increased from both articles by a reduction of the tax on the former to fifty cents on the gallon, and upon the latter to sixteen cents on the pound, all experience attests.

The excise tax has never been popular in any country wherever it has been adopted. In England to this good day it is annoying to the people and difficult of execution. It is a very ancient system of taxation, having its origin far back in the mists of centuries. The Roman emperor Augustus first adopted it as a means of revenue, and Roman generals afterward collected tithes and excises from the people to maintain their armies. It was introduced into England in the seventeenth century. The usurper Cromwell, despite the consent of Parliament, levied excises upon the people. In this country I am not aware that it ever prevailed until during and since the late war. It is true that on account of the stamp act the Boston merchants disguised themselves during the existence of the confederation and threw the cargo of tea into the sea; from which patriotic act, as it was then and is now considered, the immediate hostilities ensued which ended so gloriously in the establishment of our present form of government. But the government of the colonies or of the United States did not adopt the system of excises as a means of revenue, except perhaps in a limited degree for a very short time.

But what I wish to say is that the system is unpopular and that as soon as a better system of import duties upon the principles of revenue can be devised, which I think is feasible and probable, there should be at least some abatement of the present one and eventually it may be abolished. In any event, I trust that the Representatives on this floor who have an agricultural and laboring constituency behind them, will be careful to see that if any interest is relieved by this Congress from taxation that the relief will be extended to them instead of being extended to the banks and bankers, who have their lobby here year after year importuning Congress to relieve them of the small tax of 1 per cent. upon their circulation, one-half of 1 per cent. upon their deposits, and also one-half of 1 per cent. of their capital stock not invested in United States bonds. As I am convinced that the banking monopoly is a standing menace to the prosperity of the people, I could not well treat of taxation and expenditure without recognizing their immediate relation to the same.

NATIONAL BANKS—CHAPTER OF ABOMINATIONS.

These institutions have grown plethoric by reason of the exclusive privileges with which Congress has surrounded them at the expense of all other interests in the land, by means of which they have amassed overgrown fortunes, and by collusion and conspiracy with other forms of capital have managed to destroy a market value for real estate and its products, and indeed every other kind of property, manufactures included, and by the same process of financial cunning and political legerdemain have succeeded in appreciating the purchasing power of money until that alone seems to possess any real value. And yet with their complete dominion over every other interest in the land, dictating as with the undisputed power of an absolute despot the fate of the creditor class, and dooming, as by an imperial ukase, to bankruptcy and ruin the entire debtor class, with all this power in their hands, beneath which millions of people, brave, good men, are staggering with their insupportable loads, and helpless women and children are growing anxious about their fate for the morrow, this privileged class, the nation's pets, are here urging Congress to relieve them of this small tax and let it be placed if necessary upon industry and labor. Although the tax is very small in per cent. yet the amount aggregated from this source last year amounted to the large sum of $10,828,656.12. The representatives of this privileged class on this floor were found voting against the restoration of the income tax when that issue was presented a short time since, as they have already shown their hostility to any proposition looking to the relief of industry, especially agricultural and mechanical.

Leaving out of view the immense injury inflicted by the banks upon the people by their active agency in depreciating every species of property and prostrating all business in influencing the policy of contraction, for which they are mainly responsible, the usurious practices of the banks have wrought demoralization upon many in business circles and dried up the fountains of human sympathy and turned the hearts of thousands, under the plea of self-protection, into stones. Search the annals of history, either Christian or pagan countries, and no such unmixt monopoly was ever before granted to any class of citizens. To write their history would be a chapter of abominations. The tribute they have laid upon labor and the shameful manner in which they have exploited the Government and the people should arouse a just indignation against them and sweep them out of existence as soon as it is practicable to substitute legal-tender United States Treasury notes or some other form of Government paper for their circulation. I will call the attention of the House to a quotation from the speech of an able republican member, delivered a few years since upon this floor, which will exhibit more perfectly the internal operations of these institutions than anything I can say. I have alluded to the politics of the member that it might not be considered as a picture limned with partisan prejudice or political antipathy:

Let me state the way a national bank got itself into existence in New England during the war, when gold was 200 and five-twenties were at par in currency or nearly that. A company of men got together $300,000 in national bank bills and went to the Register of the Treasury, with gold at 200, and bought United States 5-20 bonds at par. They stepped into the office of the Comptroller of the Currency and asked to be established as a national bank, and received from him $270,000 in currency, without interest, upon pledging these bonds of the United States they had just bought with their $300,000 of the same kind of money. Now, let us balance the books, and how does the account stand? Why, the United States Government received $30,000 in currency for which, in fact, it paid $18,000 a year in gold interest, equal to $36,000 in currency, for the use of this $30,000. * * * This bank was made a public depository, and thereupon the commissaries, the quartermasters, the medical director and purveyor, and the paymasters were all directed to deposit their funds in this bank. Very soon the bank found that they had a line of steady deposits belonging to the Government of about a million dollars, and that the $270,000 they had received from the Comptroller of the Currency would substantially carry on their daily business, and as the Government gives three days on all its drafts, if the bank was pressed it was easy enough to go on the street if they had good security. They took the million of Government money so deposited with them and loaned it to the Government for the Government's own bonds and received therefor $60,000 more interest in gold for the loan to the Government of its own money, which in currency was equal to $120,000. So that when we come to finally balance the books the Government is paying $156,000 a year for the loan of $30,000. And this is the system which is to be fastened forever on the country as a means of furnishing a circulating medium.

Nature in her wildest freaks never produced such a paradox nor art such a fraud as the national banks furnish in their internal workings. This banking system is the only instance known to human law which enables a man to draw interest on his capital and also on his debts at the same time. The banks lend their currency, which is their debt, have that same currency deposited in their vaults and relend it again and draw interest on the same money in each case, and at the same time draw from the Government 6 per cent. upon the bonds deposited, thus drawing interest three times at the same moment on the same capital. The substance of the people is being consumed faster than a candle is when lighted at both ends by that operation, which is their usual practice. The American Congress for the last decade has been controlled, I am sorry to admit, by bank influence. It was the bank influence that defeated the currency equalization bill of 1874, which fell by the stroke of a presidential veto. It is that influence which prevents a reduction of the internal-revenue taxes; it is that which prevents the restoration of the income tax; it is that which prevents a modification of the protective system, under the blighting influence of which our commerce languishes and our domestic energies are being enervated. How much longer shall banks and bankers rule the American Congress?

THE FINANCIAL TRINITY.

But I ask pardon for this brief seeming digression, and yet I cannot resist the conviction that this country cannot have monetary quiet and prosperity until this third person in the financial trinity is with the other two, resumption and silver demonetization, (the latter has been effected,) finally abated and made things of the past. These bankers and capitalists are just now very busy talking about the faith of contracts. I believe in the sanctity of contracts. Respect for the inviolability of contracts is as essential to national honor, as it is to private character and reputation. Waiving, for the sake of the argument, the injustice done to the people of the United States in pledging the faith of the Government to discharge its bonds in coin, as provided by the act of the 18th of March, 1869, when all the world knows that the principal of the 5-20 bonds was payable in currency or greenbacks, the pretense now attempted to be set up by the bondholders and bankers that the word "coin" means only gold is as flagrant perversion of the true intent and meaning of the act as it is possible for a conscience dead to all the sensibilities of justice and buried in the filthy mires of cupidity to conceive. These bondholders, not content with the immense sum of $678,551,460, as estimated by reliable data, that was by a single congressional enactment poured into their vaults, (for which the people did not receive a dollar, but had this large sum added to their already burdened shoulders,) until lately, demanded gold in payment of these obligations, because silver was demonetized through their own agency in 1873, and since that time has declined in value by the side of gold until since its recent remonetization.

No such impudent infraction of the validity of contracts or violation of good faith can find a parallel in all the annals of American history, if indeed it can be found in the history of any enlightened land in Christendom. The demonetization of the old silver dollar was made an act of repudiation on the part of the Government, and an unjust discrimination against the tax-paying masses of American citizens in favor of a privileged class numbering but a few thousand in our own country and a like number of people in foreign lands.

Congress has partially restored the act so surreptitiously and fraudulently repealed in 1873, and by that means removed from the escutcheon of the Government the stain of repudiation in part.

The restoration of the silver dollar to its ancient and honorable position in American coinage, and the repeal of the odious resumption law, that has its career thus far strewn with the wrecks of private fortunes, sinking millions of people once enjoying affluence and wealth into bankruptcy and hopeless ruin; peopling the prisons, insane asylums, and even suicidal graves with its thousands of victims; exposing the last remnants of property of the debtor class to the remorseless foreclosure of the creditor's mortgage; congesting all the currents of business as though they had passed beneath a paralytic stroke—these two measures of relief, passed by this House during the extra session, the people anxiously and prayerfully looked to become laws, that at the last moment they would be saved from financial shipwreck. Remonetization has at last been accomplished over a presidential veto, although hampered by limitations and restrictions which retard the good effects which would otherwise have followed the enactment. Still let us rejoice that a point has been gained from which other triumphs can be achieved; for these repeal measures, taken together, would indicate a change of policy that the anacrona grip of contraction had at least loosed its fatal hold upon the body-politic and allowed it to breathe freer. Their significance would be marked by the unlocking of capital everywhere, now so cautious as to shun investment, and every department of the business world would feel their impulse and respond to their auspicious auguries for the future.

Confidence, which always withdraws from amid the storms of panic and seeks shelter among the dark and lonely vales of a selfish privacy, denying the acknowledgments of the most sacred friendships or reciprocal obligations, would again appear to inspire the hopeful, to support the weak, assure the despondent, and cheer on the adventurous and enterprising.

The act of the 18th of March, 1869 requiring the 5-20 bonds to be paid in coin and the silver demonetization act of 1873 were done in violation of good faith. The first was in violation of the express stipulations under which the bonds were issued—changing the payment from greenbacks to coin; and the second was in disregard of that act or pledge of the Government, for it required payment to be made in gold alone. Both were acts of repudiation and broken faith; and in resentment for them the people have met them with mutterings of repudiation. The Government, being in the hands of unscrupulous capital, has been made to perform an ignoble part in this wholesale spoliation of the tax-payers of this country. But the Government belongs to the people, and they can drive these money-changers out and inaugurate an administration which will correct this evil of class legislation. This is the people's Government, and if it is mal-administered by any party or set of men, let the people recover it by legal means and correct the evils by counter-legislation.

Repudiation is not the remedy for the broken faith of the Government while in the hands of the representatives of insolent and grasping capital. Such a remedy might entail universal disorder and uncertainty and would in the end prove worse than the disease. This Congress has shown itself strong enough to wipe out silver demonetization, and, if it fails to do more, the people will see to it in the next elections of Senators and Representatives that a majority will come to this capital instructed to repeal the resumption act and the coin act of the 18th of March, 1869. It is true the authorities, in anticipation of this policy, have been industrious in changing the 5-20 bonds for other forms of securities, but whatever of them remains it is but fair and right that they be paid in United States legal-tender notes, because it was the contract.

RUINOUS POLICY OF CONTRACTION.

The Secretary of the Treasury in his anxiety to resume specie payment on the 1st of January, 1879, has proposed to borrow from the bankers of New York City $50,000,000 in gold upon a four-and-a-half per cent. bond, the Government engaging to guarantee the bankers against any possible loss. Only $10,000,000 of the loan has been taken. Suppose that it is all taken, then that will swell the coin in the Treasury, including currency, to $224,324,459, as against $460,527,374 of demand liabilities, using the Secretary's own figures. Less than one-half in assets to redeem more than twice that sum in liabilities. This done too by an increase of the interest-bearing debt of the country, all for the sake of maintaining the theory of resumption, which, after all, is a mere myth, a mere financial fancy, a kind of legalized fraud, to attain which has cost millions of people their all and covered a nation with gloom.

These calculations of the Secretary are all based upon the theory that no bonds will be sent from Europe for redemption in coin.

Suppose a short crop is made this year in this country, or suppose a great European war should illumine with its camp-fires the major part of Europe and create an extravagant demand for coin, then what becomes of the paltry sum hoarded by the Secretary for the purpose of effectuating this pet scheme of the republican party? Under the most favorable auspices the Treasury cannot be placed in condition to meet the demands of resumption without three things being specifically done.

One is to make the greenbacks by law receivable for customs dues, another is to require by positive enactment that they shall be reissued as fast as they are redeemed, and the third to repeal that portion of the resumption law which provides for the destruction of 90 per cent. of legal-tenders as 100 per cent. of national currency is issued.

If provision is made for the reissuance of the paper and the permanent retention of it in circulation, the holders of the paper would perhaps not desire to exchange it for coin only to a limited extent. But without this guarantee of the reissuance of the legal-tenders, the small amount of coin would prove utterly futile to accomplish the work of resumption.

If resumption means redemption and cancellation and consequent contraction, it means, then, simply ruin. Has judicial blindness seized the Secretary and the President and the majority in the Senate, that they cannot or will not see the gulf before us, pause and retrace their steps, before all is lost? If within our power, measures of relief from this financial paralysis should be forced through Congress before the adjournment of this session. I trust that the House of Representatives at least will leave no part of its duty unperformed, throwing the responsibility entirely from our shoulders. Let us act upon these several propositions for relief now pending, and then and not till then, can we face our constituencies who groan beneath this burden of financial death.

If the legal-tenders should be made receivable for customs dues and should be required to be reissued as fast as they are redeemed, the evils of the resumption law would be very much mitigated. But as that law now stands upon the statute-book it is a standing menace to the business interests and commercial activities of the whole country. No upas tree ever shed a more baleful influence upon vegetable existence, drying up the very fountains of life, than does this resumption law upon all industrial business, as the daily bulletin of commercial failures abundantly attests.

FORCED RESUMPTION MEANS FORCED BANKRUPTCY.

The very anticipation of forced resumption has wrought this ruin. Forced resumption means forced bankruptcy both of the people and of the Government. Although greenbacks are nearly at par with coin, without additional legislation providing for their reissue after redemption, and without a substitute for the national currency after the 1st of January next, (thus depriving the people of all paper currency,) circulation would be limited to the small amount of gold and silver with which to conduct the vast volume of business in this country. If resumption is to bring such contraction as that, I repeat it, it is simple ruin now or hereafter.

Notwithstanding the failures for the first quarter of this year are much heavier than they were for the corresponding quarter of last year, yet every one feels that a propitious change is near at hand if these relief measures were adopted. Why not adopt them at once and give ease to the public apprehension? If we cannot repeal this resumption act, then stop contraction, provide for the reissue of the legal-tenders and make them receivable for customs dues, and the work is done. Confidence will at once take root again.

Wise statesmanship should avoid extremes. Capital and labor are both essential to the growth and development of free institutions and are not necessarily antagonistic on the contrary, they are mutual aids when governed and guided by laws which recognize the just rights of both. One thing it is very important for each to observe: capital should avoid being hedged about by class legislation and monopoly, while labor should sternly set its face against every appearance of agrarianism and communism.

Enact these measures of relief—restore to the Government its indisputable constitutional right to furnish its own people with currency, without delegating that important trust to a privileged monopoly of United States bondholders, and, with tariffs brought to the revenue standard, there can be no doubt of a speedy return of confidence and the establishment of that wanted prosperity once more for which the great heart of the people has bitterly sighed for the last five years. Let the people demand of their Senators and of their Representatives, before this session of Congress adjourns, that these enactments be made without limitations or restrictions; let it be done in obedience to the behests of an honest and contract-observing people, and we shall hear no more of the stifled threats of repudiation! Repudiation! Of all the people on God's foot-stool, the American people can least afford to fix upon themselves the brand of repudiation. With a territory surpassing in extent and natural wealth the imperial possessions of the Roman empire in the days of her Cæsars; with a resplendent historic renown uneclipsed by nations whose ages are frosted by hoary centuries; with a population self-governing and self-sustaining; with all the varied arts and industries developed in an unsurpassed degree by much older civilizations; with countless treasures above and below the surface of the earth, awaiting development at the hands of harmonious capital and labor, which will lift the masses of the people to a higher plane of civilization and individual prosperity than has ever fallen to the lot of any people in the book of time; with all these and innumerable other advantages, to even entertain the idea of repudiation is a folly from which we may not soon recover.

Repudiation will overthrow all respect for law and order, destroy all confidence between man and man, wipe out every vestige of credit, by which the poor man supports his family when sickness or other misfortune overtakes him, and leave him and his helpless ones beggars at the gates of the rich. It will rob the bench of its majesty and despoil the very altars of religion of their sacred canons and convert them into ridiculous mockeries. It saps the citadel of conscience and drives out the principles of truth and justice. It impudently demands for idleness the bread which industry has made with its own hands, and enthrones in all its bloody horrors the dark and damning spirit of communism over the ruins of government and society, engulfing the whole in the wildest anarchy and civil war.

Let not the people of the United States forget the sad story of France in the days of her reign of terror, when communism and atheism with locked shields paraded the streets of her ill-fated metropolis, following the banner of an abandoned woman, filling the minds of the people with contempt for law and religion, until universal doubt seized the hearts of men and the blood of thousands of the best citizens of Paris was shed to appease the moloch of passion which had dethroned reason and robbed the human soul of its aspirations for immortality; destroying all human sympathies until the icy hearts of men were unmelted by the touch of pity and their leaden ears were deaf to the supplications of helpless innocence and of pleading humanity.

A PHENOMINAL INSANITY.

A phenomenal insanity seems to have seized the minds of the people of the Eastern States, that the measures of finance and taxation which would bring relief to the great sections of the West and South and to the whole producing population of this country would operate injuriously to them. No greater delusion ever beclouded the judgment of so enlightened a people. Are not the laws made for all? Are we not united under one flag? Are we not united by innumerable commercial relations and business interests, so interlocked and intertwined that, if the interests of one section of the country are sacrificed, while it might inure to the personal gain of a few persons or classes would nevertheless injure the great body of the people and the whole country? Why is it that distress and hard times are felt in New York and Boston and throughout the eastern cities to-day, notwithstanding the fact that their banks are full to overflowing with unused capital and their business houses are groaning with unbroken stocks of merchandise awaiting purchasers? Why does labor seek in vain employment where there is so much idle capital? Simply because the mistaken system of finance and taxation has prostrated the producing classes by reducing the price of their products below the actual cost of production, and thus curtailed their means of consumption. It is the old story of obtaining the golden egg.

It is the duty of the Government to recall into action its own functions and restore its own surrendered rights. It and it alone should furnish the people a currency without relegating that power to any corporation or set of men. It is the duty of the Government to furnish the currency with as little cost to the people as possible, while its system of taxation should be equitably distributed so as not to distress any of the industries nor oppress any classes of pursuit. A tariff adjusted so as to produce the greatest amount of revenue and afford the least incidental protection approaches nearer to the principle of the equitable distribution of taxation than any other system that has yet been devised. Under the most strictly revenue tariff this country has ever had, known as the "Walker tariff of 1846," being an average duty of 25 per cent., our revenues increased from $23,747,864.66 in 1847 to $64,022,863.50 in 1856. Under the protective tariff of 1842 customs fell off in 1845, the first year after it was enacted, from $18,000,000 to $7,000,000. Contrast that fact with the frightful decline in our customs for the last six years, as I had occasion to show in a table a while ago in another connection.

The stimulus given to increased importation by the large vacuum created by the war, especially in the West, but more particularly in the Southern States, is exceptional and must not be considered as a criterion by which to judge the present tariff as a means of producing revenue. It is fairly on trial now and has been for the last six years. Does any one wonder that a tariff duty high enough to prohibit imports will defeat revenue? With coarse blankets at 90 per cent. can the foreign article be brought here and pay that enormous duty and enter into successful competition with the American manufactured blanket of the same quality and texture? No one is surprised that absolutely no revenue is derived from foreign quinine because of the duty of 100 per cent. it has to pay before it can be offered for sale. Of course the American manufacturer engrosses the entire sale at a price equal to original cost, with the duty of 100 per cent. added thereto. Hundreds of similar instances might be adduced to illustrate the same principle.

Now, it is important that a sound and healthy system of finance and taxation be settled upon, so that the business interests of the country could gauge itself by it, and thus enable our business men to lay out their plans for the future without feeling, as they now do, a constant apprehension of sudden and radical changes, and what is more, a change from bad to worse, that may result in rapid ruin. With a fixed and reliable policy established, not only would the business interests of the people revive, but the Government itself would not be driven for absolute want of revenues to what some gentlemen who have magnificent ideas of a splendid government are pleased to style a niggardly parsimony. Just here I am reminded that but for the $64,000,000 of reduction by the Forty-fourth Congress your Treasury at this moment might be without a surplus, and beyond the relief which the temporary suspension of the sinking fund would afford. Certainly there would be no appeal of the Secretary of the Treasury to the House of Representatives to reduce the expenditures in the round sum of $11,000,000 below the aggregate of the estimated revenues for the next fiscal year.

Now I have thought it proper to thus allude to our financial policy and our system of taxation because the appropriations of the Government are so intimately blended with them, and indeed are made to depend upon them. For of what avail would it be to order the Secretary of the Treasury to issue his warrant upon the Treasurer for an appropriation pursuant to law if there is not money provided to honor the draft? Hence a reasonable and intelligent economy in public expenditures becomes an important adjunct particularly at this time with our system of finance and taxation. Instead of adding to the burden may we not prudently and safely reduce it?

In the allusion, made a while since, to the administrative economy of the Senate, I did so with the highest respect for that august body. Its intellectual triumphs will compare favorably with the most renowned forums of earth; its glories every true American shares and rejoices in, for its great, honored names of the past are household words and sacred memories. But I approach a grave question of constitutional power; of organic structure. I do not deny that the Senate has the right to select its own officers, that power is distinctly granted, but I do deny that it has the sole right of fixing their salaries or their number, a practice grown up by a kind of common consent which has become quite popular of late years among fashionable politicians under the specious plea of "comity" between the two Houses, a usage unknown to the Constitution.

And as it cannot be denied that the House of Representatives has a right to an equal voice, to say the least of it, in fixing the salaries of the officers of the Senate, it follows that the House has a voice in determining the number of officers in that body, otherwise there would be no limit to appropriations necessary to their payment except such as the Senate alone should see proper to impose. While it is in no sense the province of this bill now under consideration to institute any legislation whatever affecting the powers of the two Houses or in any manner enlarging or restricting either of them, I will be pardoned if I offer a few thoughts upon what I conceive to be the encroachments of the Senate upon the peculiar prerogatives of the House, which have been suggested by the large sums added by way of amendments to the House appropriation bills of late years and which have led me to make a recent review of the proceedings of the constitutional convention of 1787. At that early day, when only a few millions of dollars were annually collected, there was intense feeling and interest felt over the question of taxation. Now when the great economic questions of finance, taxation, internal improvements, production and transportation, are justly engrossing the attention of the people and will do so for a term of years, to the exclusion of the sickly sentimentalities of politics that are no longer interesting—now, when race issues and sectional animosities are abjured and despised by good men North and South, this inquiry becomes pertinent and of absorbing interest.

AN OCCUPATION GONE.

The occupation of demagogues in either section who would still keep alive the embers of our past conflicts is gone, and the different States and geographical sections (for political sections are abolished) are more closely knit by a community of material interests and political doctrines than has existed within the last half century. Indeed, a mighty host is gathering beneath the banner of reform and millions of honest hearts East, West, North, and South, are inspired with but one sentiment, and that is, how, under the Constitution, shall we restore the national weal. It is, then, but natural that the public mind should rivet itself upon those subjects which most deeply affect their interests; and since the accumulation of debts, national, State, municipal, corporate, and individual is estimated at $10,000,000,000, and the annual interest is $600,000,000, consuming a large share of the profits of industry, economy in expenditures becomes an important factor in the rate of taxation which the people have to bear. The vast sum of the public debt and the annual large amount necessary to meet the interest on the same and defray the ordinary current expenditures of the Government, and the other varied sources of taxation, municipal, corporate, State, and individual, so far exhausts the surplus profits of the people's labor as to revive the anxious inquiry in the public mind concerning not only the amount of revenue to be raised, but the manner of the assessment, and indeed the inquiry extends to the root where the very power itself resides.

POWERS OF THE TWO HOUSES.

The jealousy with which the whole question of taxation is regarded in these days of national distress and individual bankruptcy suggests the propriety of an inquiry into the derivation of the power in order that the responsibility shall be placed where it justly belongs. The subject, then, must be viewed in its constitutional bearings, for it, like almost all other great powers of government, was duly considered by the very wise men who made our Federal Constitution, and wherever that responsibility is located by the Constitution the people ultimately will not fail to recognize it and will scrupulously exact a rigid performance of the duties which attach to the powers.

I submit these propositions:

First. The House having the sole right and power to originate revenue bills under the Constitution has as a necessary sequence the sole right to originate and introduce appropriation bills, otherwise the increased expenditures for appropriation bills would require the House to increase the revenue it had already provided.

Second. When the Senate has proposed an amendment and the House has non-concurred the Senate has exhausted its constitutional power and has no right to further insist, otherwise the House is again forced to consent to additional revenue to meet the Senate's increased demand.

Third. The Senate has no right to propose an amendment not germane to either a revenue or an appropriation bill, as that destroys the autonomy of the House's peculiar prerogative under article I, section 7.

Fourth. To concede equal power to the Senate over revenue and appropriation bills destroys the principle of taxation and representation, by the equal representation of the small with the large States in the Senate.

Fifth. The equal power of the Senate with the House over revenue and appropriation bills defeats the theory of popular sovereignty over the question of taxation. It also defeats the compromise agreed upon in the convention which gave birth to the Constitution, which was equal representation of the small with the large States in the Senate; while the House, which represents the people, should have exclusive control over the vital question of taxation.

In this country the power of taxation is inherent in the people and under the Constitution the right belongs, if not in express terms at least by analogy, alone to the House of Representatives. Article I, section 7, reads:

All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives, but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments as in other bills.

The manifest purpose of this, the greatest of all constitutional prerogatives, was to retain this right or power as near to the people as possible. The Senators not being elected by the people and only once in six years, the great and wise men who framed our admirable political system reserved to the Representatives this delicate and vital power because they were elected immediately by the popular vote and because they are required to surrender every two years their legislative trust back to the people.

The Constitution having invested this House with the power of originating all revenue or money bills, as a necessary and logical deduction it has ever been the uniform practice of the Senate to concede to the House the right to originate the general appropriation bills with one or two exceptions, in which cases the House as promptly denied the power of the Senate and asserted its exclusive right to originate them: as in the Thirty-fourth Congress, the House failing for over two months to organize, the Senate passed two of the general appropriation bills and sent them down to the House, whereupon the House at once laid them upon the table, refusing either to consider or refer them to a committee. This power was again conceded by the Senate in the case of the tariff compromise bill of Mr. Clay, in 1833. The great lights of the Senate in that day took the ground that the bill trenching upon the prerogatives of the House and was therefore unconstitutional. Mr. Webster was prominent in declaring it unconstitutional, and Mr. Clay himself conceded it virtually by taking up an exactly similar bill that had passed the House and had it substituted for his own, laying his upon the table.

The power of the House to originate appropriation bills has been the practice of the Government from its origin and is fairly deducible from the clause of the Constitution already quoted, if indeed the language is not a direct and absolute constitutional mandate. Hence, the people have come to hold the Representatives responsible in a large measure for assessments and expenditures, and by usage as well as by theory overlook the action of the Senate and exculpate them from special responsibility, having no power to apply to Senators the corrective only through remote and indirect agencies of State Legislatures, which oftentimes misrepresent the people. But lest the view I have expressed should be controverted I will be pardoned for a slight historical sketch of this very interesting question. It is practically interesting in view of the frequent enormous amounts and questionable objects with which our appropriation bills are loaded by amendments in the other end of the Capitol. But more especially is it a subject of vital and momentous interest when the fact is recognized that our financial and revenue policy is in a great manner influenced by Senators representing a very small number of people. And for these reasons it has occurred to me that the consideration of the relative powers of each House in this connection and at this time would not be inapt or unessential, and might serve to familiarize the public mind with the peculiar constitutional functions of the two Houses of Congress. Although ours is a republic and the British government a limited monarchy, yet it is historically true that this identical feature of our Constitution was borrowed from English precedent. Mr. Justice Story in his commentaries on the Constitution of the United States in speaking upon this subject asserts that this feature of our Constitution is borrowed from the British House of Commons, section 874. He says:

The general reason given for this privilege of the House of Commons is, that the supplies are raised upon the body of the people and therefore it is proper that they alone should have the right of taxing themselves.

In speaking of Mr. Justice Blackstone's opinions on this feature of the British constitution, Mr. Story says, section 874:

It would therefore be extremely dangerous to give the lords any power of framing new taxes for the subject. It is sufficient that they have the power of rejecting if they think the commons too lavish or improvident in their grants.

Not only that the lords shall frame no new taxes, but that the power to reject is sufficient for them! For long years the issue existed between the Houses of Lords and the Commons in England, without being definitely settled. Both houses asserted the power to originate revenue bills, and both exercised that important function for a time, each upon its own constituency. But in 1678 a resolution was adopted by the House of Commons to this effect:

That all aids and supplies and aids to his Majesty in Parliament are the sole gift of the Commons, and all bills for the granting of such aids and supplies, ought to begin with the Commons; and that it is the undoubted and sole right of the Commons to direct, limit, and appoint in such bills the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations, and qualifications of such grants which ought not to be changed or altered by the House of Lords.

This power, so tersely and comprehensively expressed in the resolution just quoted, may be regarded as the final struggle between the two Houses of Parliament over the long-disputed issue. The House of Lords acquiesced and the Commons ever since have triumphantly asserted the exclusive right to originate money bills, yielding only to the House of Lords the right not to amend either by reduction or addition, but to concur in or reject altogether.

Now, then, it will not be denied that this British precedent is the origin of that clause of our Constitution already quoted. It will be observed that the language of the resolution of the Commons, passed just two hundred years ago, and what is very remarkable passed upon the 3d of July, within one day of the anniversary of the natal day of American Independence, asserting the power, too, which in my judgment contains the very germ of republican government, restricts the Lords from any power except to concur and reject, while our Constitution authorizes the Senate to propose or concur with amendments. The word "propose" may seem to confer a greater power upon the Senate than the House of Lords have possessed for two centuries; but when it is remembered that we derived this power from the English government, and when the fact is brought out that this right was conceded to the House by the framers of the Constitution in compensation for other great and exclusive rights granted to the Senate, such, for instance, as the right to try impeachments, to ratify treaties, and to confirm appointments, such an assumption cannot be either historically or logically maintained.

This power was also conceded to preserve the equilibrium between the two Houses and was yielded to the House because the population of some of the States was much greater than that of others, thereby maintaining the principle of taxation and representation; while on the other hand the autonomy of the States was preserved by giving to each State equal representation in the Senate, no matter whether great or small. Every student of American history readily recalls the vexed questions which so perplexed the fathers of the Republic in framing and adjusting the dual system of government, which is our pride and our boast to-day, being a government where the ultimate sovereignty rests with the people, yet so arranged and restricted by Federal checks that small political communities like the New England sisterhood could exercise an effectual restraint upon political communities ten or twenty times their size, either in territory or in population, by their equal representation in the Senate. The Constitution was born of the spirit of compromise and is itself a series of compromises. The legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the Government, being each a check upon the other, were agreed upon as a compromise between extreme political theorists. And the power to regulate commerce was retained to the General Government for the protection of commerce at the urgent demand of the New England States, for which they in turn consented that the slave trade, which was desired by some other States, should be continued until the year 1808.

The power to originate tax bills, to say how much taxes should be collected, and, of course, how much should be expended, was conceded to the representatives of the people, and was therefore a concession to the larger States by the smaller States in compensation for equal representation in the Senate, by which the smallest State could in legislation counterbalance the largest State. This immense senatorial equality reserved and granted to a political organism called a State, with the exclusive right given to the Senate to try impeachments, to ratify treaties, and confirm appointments, was tendered as a compromise between a purely national Government and our present admirable federative system. The precise limitations of power to be placed in either House in the convention of 1787 were most difficult to define and adjust; so much so that the gravest apprehensions prevailed that the convention would fail to agree upon a different and "more perfect Union" than that of the old colonial government. In this anxious condition of affairs—moments pregnant with the mightiest events that have ever illustrated human annals, as shown in the majestic march of the grandest civilization and the greatest political power that ever found a place upon the map of nations—in this critical moment the spirit of liberty hovered over that illustrious convention and breathed upon the hearts of those patriot-statesmen, and imbued them with the love of the sacred rights of man, and their work became a mighty success.

I have not made reference to this subject because I entertain any prejudice against the smaller States or would in anywise affect their organism, but am actuated by the sole desire to see a growing evil checked, to wit: that of virtually conceding equal constitutional prerogatives to the Senate with the House of Representatives over the question of taxation, a question which for the next twenty years is destined to be the great and vitally absorbing issue of American politics. I simply desire that the practices of the Senate shall not be substituted for the written law of the Constitution. It may seem a strange matter at a cursory glance that I or any one else should deny to the Senate equal power over this one subject. But it did not seem so one hundred years ago to the prescient and far-seeing statesmen of that day. Although the practical use of the power was doubtless of little value in that day compared with the present time; but now, when our flag floats almost over a continent and our population is rapidly increasing, swelling from three millions, one hundred years ago, to nearly fifty millions to-day, with an annual collection of $300,000,000 from the pockets of the people, the subject becomes a serious one. It is not a little matter to the people of New York when they come to remember that in the last fifteen years they have paid into the Treasury of the United States in excises exclusive of customs $463,450,337, while Delaware has paid only $7,522,696. And yet on a question of taxation, upon the theory that the Senate has equal and co-ordinate power with the House, Delaware's power is equal to that of New York, although the one State has one Representative while the other has thirty-three. Grant the theory that the Senate has the right to insist, after the House has non-concurred in the Senate's proposed amendments, and the whole doctrine of the right of the people to control the measure of taxation is overthrown. The power of taxation is thereby wrested from the people and handed over to the States.

This particular power, the right of taxation, the exclusive right to originate money bills, without which origination there can be no taxation, proved to be a subject of paramount care and jealousy in the convention.

The immortal names of Benjamin Franklin, Elbridge Gerry, Mr. Rutledge, Mr. Mason, Mr. Ellsworth and six others were appointed a committee to whom the grave question involving the relative powers of the two Houses should be referred. Each State represented in the convention was represented on the committee. The subject had been exhaustively discussed, and among the wisest and greatest of the convention were selected to settle the principles on which the new Government was to start in its march to power and renown.

I will condense in as brief a space as possible certain leading features of the proceedings of the constitutional convention of 1787, as given in Elliott's debates on the Constitution, and Madison's notes, and which I think clearly demonstrate the spirit and animus of the convention, showing that it was only intended to give the Senate a limited power over money bills. These may be found in an appendix marked "A."

It will be observed by reference to these extracts that in the contest in the convention whether the House should have the right to originate money bills, it was always coupled with the power to fix salaries of officers. The two features were inseparable in the minds of the members, and the one was treated as a necessary requisite of the other—and why not?

It seems reasonable that if the House has the right to levy and collect taxes and originate bills for appropriations and disbursements, it necessarily includes the power to fix the salaries of officers; otherwise the Senate might influence and require such large salaries as to compel the House to unwillingly originate other and new revenue bills and thus to increase taxes, which would be a manifest violation of the exclusive prerogative of the House to "originate money bills." Because if the extravagance of the Senate forces the House to increase taxes or else have a bankrupt Treasury, of course the volition and will and right of the House is coerced and destroyed. The historical analogies and suggestions which the proceedings of that convention furnish, attested by limited discussions of the members of the body, all tend to establish the principle and fact that in controlling the revenues of the people limitations were placed upon the power of the Senate subordinating it to the House in this particular.

If then the phrase "may propose amendments" was intended to confer upon the Senate, over the purse, equal power with the House, wherein is there any limitation? Where any subordination? What, too, has become of the compromise which Mr. Madison said was made between the two Houses in agreeing to article 1, section 7, of the Constitution? And if the Senate has equal power with the House over the Treasury under that clause, why was there such a struggle in the convention to adjust the relative powers of each House, at one time threatening the disruption of the convention, which was only prevented by concessions to each House? The right to tax and the corresponding right to appropriate are prerogatives which the House of Representatives alone can initiate; but the Senate has the right of a veto by non-concurrence. The right to "propose" amendments is limited to that degree, which, if exceeded, would coerce the House to initiate an increase of taxes, and thus the Senate become an equal partner with the House in the origination of money bills, which would be in the teeth of both the spirit and letter of the Constitution. The literal construction of the language of the Constitution, unassociated with the historical events and parliamentary proceedings of the constitutional convention, which express its true spirit and indicate the extent of the powers designed to be conferred upon each House, may be stretched to the point of proposing amendments not materially increasing appropriations; but should the House non-concur the Senate has no right to insist, otherwise the power of the Senate over the public Treasury is equal with the House. This power, too, of the Senate is limited by another restriction: the amendment proposed must be germane to the subject-matter in which the House has asked its concurrence, otherwise the Senate might as well originate the proposition, which, if it is admitted on all sides, it does not possess under the Constitution. If the Senate can exercise an unrestricted will in proposing amendments, whether germane or not, then the Constitution contains the Jesuitical power of doing by indirection that which cannot be done by direction. Will any American statesman hazard his reputation by the assertion that any such power was designed by the framers of the Constitution to be inserted in that instrument? If the Constitution had been ordained in this Machiavellian age, such a pernicious and unsound doctrine might have obtained; but thus to conclude that in those primitive times, when a struggling people had just emerged from the baptismal fires of revolution and had by their heroic sacrifices rescued the genius of liberty and of political truth from the tyrant's grasp and had met in convention through their chosen delegates to forever consecrate and dedicate to themselves and to their posterity a Constitution every page of which is luminous with these immortal principles, is as illogical and absurd in argument as the theory is demoralizing in politics and the fact inveterate in history.

Let it not be forgotten that an appropriation bill, although strictly speaking not a revenue measure, is nevertheless inseparably connected with it, and the two operate reciprocally upon each other, for especially is an appropriation bill the gauge or measure of a revenue bill. The right of the Senate does not embrace the power to propose amendments not germane to the proposition or bill of the House, for that would be in effect to originate new money bills, which is expressly forbidden. Its action is partially concurrent in so far that it does not trench upon the volition of the House to originate a money bill, or shall operate to compel the House for the sake of conducting the machinery of government to yield to appropriations which require an increase of taxation. Article 1, section 1, of the Constitution provides that—

All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

But this concurrent power must be construed in view of the limitations imposed by other provisions of the instrument. For who would say that the House has the power to try impeachments or ratify treaties, a power expressly vested in the Senate, notwithstanding article 1, section 1?

It must be remembered that the power to originate revenue bills lies at the very base of popular government. Shall it therefore be said that the word "propose" in our Constitution shall be so construed as to diminish the rights and powers of the House of Representatives below the standard of the prerogatives of the British House of Commons? Shall it be said that the people of the United States have less control over their own revenues, and therefore less control over all of their internal political relations, than the people of Great Britain exercise over their own affairs? And yet, if the Senate has the right to propose new amendments not germane and to increase indefinitely the appropriations, and thereby render necessary an indefinite increase of taxes, sustaining, as they do by their election, such a remote and partial responsibility to the people, who can logically or practically deny the proposition that the people of the United States are less free than the people of England and have less control over their own property? I have great respect for the dignity, ability, and patriotism of the United States Senate. I would not violate the "comity" of the two Houses. I would not detract from its rightful authority or diminish or deny any of its constitutional powers; but I am equally jealous of the rights and privileges of the House of Representatives.

The practice of late years in the Senate has been to amend appropriation bills most extravagantly, growing in a great measure out of what are amiably styled the "courtesies" of that body, as before intimated. I submit if that practice is not unwarranted by the Constitution. If the House must practically yield this fundamental right by conceding to the Senate all manner of amendments and of enormous amounts, of what value is the mere right to originate a revenue bill? In effect it might as well be originated in the one House as in the other; for the safeguard of the Treasury of the people is removed, to wit, the right to hold every two years the immediate Representatives responsible for the manner in which they discharge their trusts. This practice of unlimited amendment by the Senate practically defeats the compromise agreed upon in the constitutional convention. The small States, retaining equal representation in the Senate and usurping equal authority with the House over the purse of the people through the Senate, are thereby invested with undue power, to the extent of defeating the great American doctrine of the Revolution, that of taxation and representation.

Take for instance the six New England States, with a voting population of 671,665. Take the great State of Ohio; her voting population is 658,573, a small fraction less than in all of New England, and yet New England has twelve Senators and Ohio has two. Now it is plain to be seen that if the Senate has equal power and right with the House to declare what taxes shall be levied upon and collected from the people, it is equally clear that the property and rights of the people of Ohio are not under the guardianship of the immediate Representatives and Senators from Ohio, but are under the control and at the mercy of the Senate. It may be said that the superior numbers of Representatives in the House from Ohio and the large States may check the influence of the small States in the Senate. It is true they can only check them as the Senate may the House, but when it is known that almost all important legislation is the result of compromise and is shaped and fashioned by the manipulators of conference committees, each side or each body conceding a part, it may be readily perceived what a great advantage on all questions of political economy, taxation, finance, &c., the few thousands of people represented by the Senators from the small States may exercise over the destinies of the many millions of people in the large States. I do not oppose our system of government; I would not detract one iota from the equal power given to the small States as prescribed by the Constitution, believing as I do from the teachings of history, as well as from the suggestions of analogy and the force of logic, that this great right of taxation was excepted from that equal jurisdiction.

Will any political economist who holds to the American doctrine of taxation and representation tell me that it is republican that the votes of the two Senators and one Representative of Delaware in Congress should, in the last event, have an equal voice with the two Senators and the thirty-three Representatives from the great State of New York over the purse of the people? I mention Delaware because she is the smallest of the sisterhood, not that I have not the profoundest respect for her history and her present renown. I would not in the slightest degree impair her autonomy or dim the luster of the little resplendent star that answers to her name upon the American banner. Look at the immense difference in revenue derived from each State, being in the last fifteen years about sixty-six times as great in New York as in Delaware in internal revenue, and doubtless in the same proportion in customs derived from consumption. It is not a sufficient answer to say that Delaware is as sovereign a State as New York. That I grant. But I would recall the attention of Delaware and the small States to the fact that they were allowed in this, as has been aptly styled by another the first great compromise, certain specified prerogatives: to try impeachments, to ratify treaties, and confirm appointments, and to have equal representation in the Senate with the larger States as a guarantee for the concession, on the other hand, that the House, which means the large States or, in other words, the masses or majority of the people who pay the taxes, should have control over their collection and disbursement; yielding to the Senate a veto power and a right to partially alter or amend, to perfect but not to materially increase the amount, otherwise there is no compromise, and no concessions whatever are made to the House by the Senate; yet the Senate's peculiar prerogatives remain all intact and its share of the compromise is maintained and constantly recognized, as in the matter of treaty-making, trying impeachments, &c.

Mr. Chairman, it is well enough to talk about the Constitution, whether we observe it or not. For my part I do not think there is any safety outside of it. If I lived in Delaware I should stickle and stand up for the spirit and letter of the Constitution, believing it to be the ark of safety and the palladium of liberty. The American Constitution designed that the subject of taxation should be controlled by public opinion, and as Representatives are subject to the ordeal of biennial elections this delicate trust for that reason was lodged with the House. Who pretends to say that the Senate represents public opinion? Elected for six years by a body mediatory between them and the people, they know nor care but little for the popular will, and yet if they misrepresent the popular will they do not give place as do the English ministry when defeated upon a given policy and allow those who truly represent the will of the people to fill their places. Public opinion is more potent in monarchical England than it is in republican America, for its summons and behests are more promptly obeyed.

The sanctity and jealous care with which the House of Commons regards the exclusive control over the treasury of the realm is illustrated in the frequent exercise of that right by withholding supplies from the crown when it refuses the exactions or demands of the commons. It is in the hands of the lower house of Parliament, the great conservator of popular liberty, and for two centuries the House of Lords, nor the Crown, nor the Queen's Bench have dared to question it. It is no less an American than it is a great British right, one which lies at the threshold of the temple of freedom and is sacred to the very hearthstone of the American citizen.

Now from the tenor of these appended citations from the proceedings of the convention of 1787, to which I again invite your careful perusal, it is clear that a compromise was effected by which the small States were to have equal representation in the Senate, and the House to have control of the purse and taxation. All of these various propositions recognized that compromise and frequently received the sanction of the convention. The compromise included the right of the House to fix the salaries of officers as well as the right to originate money bills.

It is true I do not assert the doctrine that the Senate has not an equal power with the House in fixing reasonable salaries, as the language in reference to salaries was at the last moment left out of the text of the Constitution, as I will hereafter show. Yet any extravagance on the part of the Senate in that respect would be a palpable usurpation, viewed from the standpoint of the constitutional convention of 1787, as its proceedings will show. Could the framers of the Constitution have been told that the American Senate, in the Forty-fourth Congress, would coerce the House to yield to the fixing the President's salary at $50,000, I do not doubt but that the resolution reserving the feature of fixing salaries as one of the prerogatives of the House, reported back to the convention on the 5th of July by the grand committee of one from each State, with the recommendation that it pass, and which was afterward adopted and repeatedly endorsed, would in that very language have finally been ingrafted into the text of the Constitution, which was only modified by the language at last agreed upon, but which the whole proceedings and the speeches of different members conclusively show was intended to have the same or tantamount signification with that resolution. The assumption of such a power for the Senate would have defeated the formation of the Constitution in the last resort.

At the very last, after the full draft of the Constitution was made, the phraseology was changed and abbreviated and adopted, retaining the power over the subject of taxation or money bills as the friends and advocates of the popular or first branch of Congress had all along contended. Which phraseology construed by the other forms of expression in which this power retained for the House was expressed, it is clear that the idea was intended to be conveyed that upon the subject of taxing the people or appropriating their money, including the fixing of salaries, the House had control except that the Senate might propose in an advisory manner or concur, but not insist upon amendments. And further, that it would not have the right to propose amendments not germane or that would require the House to consent to new or additional taxes. In other words, that the Senate should confine itself to perfecting the legislation concerning money bills by altering and amending but in the spirit which originally actuated the House in initiating and perfecting the proposition.

Otherwise, is it to be supposed that the advocates for the retention of this power in the House which had been the bone of contention and upon which there was at one time imminent danger of disruption as before stated, and which after long and elaborate consideration had resulted in a compromise, should thus have surrendered it, if it is contended that the Senate can increase an appropriation to any extent its fancy chooses? The friends of the House side of this question had been able upon every distinct vote in the convention to carry their point all along upon every phase of the issue from the beginning, and with the concession of their demand clearly set forth in the various resolutions that had been adopted, they only agreed to an abbreviation and alteration of the language, which seemed to contain all that they had claimed for the House and which was not controverted; and thus the language of the Constitution passed, and was at last adopted without serious opposition. The latter clause, giving the Senate the right to propose or concur in amendments, passed nem. con.; the first clause passed by a vote of 9 to 2, thus clearly showing that the friends of the popular or first branch of Congress construed the language adopted as carrying out in good faith the spirit of the compromise which lay at the base of the Constitution, namely: equal representation in the Senate of the small States with the large States; but the control of the purse by the House, with advisory power in the Senate only.

But, Mr. Chairman, that I may not be regarded as singular in the view I have taken of the powers of the respective Houses in reference to this great question of taxation and expenditure, I will quote the language of a gentleman whom our friends on the other side will be proud to recognize as authority. The speech I quote from was delivered in this House in May, 1858, and I have no doubt that I heard it, as I was then serving my first term in Congress. I quote:

Sir, retrenchment and reform are now matters of imperative necessity. It is not the mere cry of demagogues, but a problem demanding the consideration and worthy the highest attention of the representatives of the people. No party is fit to govern this country that cannot solve it. It is vain to look to executive officers for reform. Their power and influence depend upon executive patronage; and while we grant they will squander. The Senate is neither by the theory of our system nor by its constitution fitted for the task.

This House alone has the constitutional power to perfect a radical reform. The Constitution provides that "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law;" and that "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives." These provisions were designed to invest in this House the entire control over the public purse, the power of supply. This is invested in the House of Commons, and has been jealously guarded by it. It is the pearl beyond price, without which constitutional liberty in England would long since have fallen under the despotism of the Crown.

Instead of a representative republic, we are degenerating into a bureaucracy, governed by red tape and subaltern clerks.

This was the language twenty years ago of Representative John Sherman, now Secretary of the Treasury. If there was just apprehension then that the constitutional powers of this House were in danger of being wrested from it by the inroads of the Senate through amendments largely increasing expenditures, "being neither by the theory of our system nor by its composition fitted to the task" of reform; if we were in danger of our merging our "representative Republic into a bureaucracy governed by red-tape and subaltern clerks" then, what greater apprehension is there now, when this tendency has grown fourfold since that time.

If, Mr. Chairman, I have succeeded in calling the attention of this House to the necessity of reforming certain abuses in the practical legislation of Congress, and in suggesting the importance that this great and fundamental right of taxation should be preserved to the first or popular branch of the National Legislature, in accordance with the spirit and genius of the American Constitution; if, indeed, I shall have dropped a word which may hereafter direct the attention of some abler mind to this vital issue, I may say that I am more than content. It is a subject which will force itself into the practical politics of this country in the not very remote future.

One word more, sir. The Committee on Appropriations have sought to co-operate most cordially with the other committees of the House in the reduction of public expenditures, and take pleasure in acknowledging that they have been greatly aided by the suggestions of several of them. Doubtless very many reforms might have been instituted which are omitted in this bill could the various committees have had time to submit their reports, of which we could have availed ourselves, but which for the present must be deferred, perhaps until another session. The subcommittee, consisting of Judge DURHAM and Mr. FOSTER, with myself, have addressed ourselves to this work laboriously and in no spirit of party. If it has merit, they are entitled to share the honor; if on the contrary, they alike share with me the responsibility for its demerits. At all events, the bill is the result of the harmonious action of the entire Committee on Appropriations, and as such we submit it to the candid judgment of this House, knowing full well that while that judgment will be fair, at the same time it will be searching.

[APPENDIX.]

On the 29th of June, 1789, in the Federal Convention at Philadelphia, Mr. Randolph introduced a series of resolutions. It was moved and seconded to amend the eighth resolution, as follows:

"Resolved, That in the second branch of the Legislature [meaning the Senate] of the United States each State shall have an equal vote."

No action was taken and the convention adjourned. On the 30th of June, the resolution was discussed at length and the convention adjourned until July 2, on which day the resolution was voted upon with the following result: yeas 5, nays 5, divided 1; and was passed in the negative. The journal states a committee was then appointed consisting of one member from each State, to whom was referred the eighth resolution and so much of the seventh resolution reported from the Committee of the Whole House as had not been decided upon. Upon the motion to appoint this committee the vote was—yeas 9, nays 2.

On the 5th of July the committee, consisting of a member from each State, to whom had been referred the resolutions, reported the following clause favorably:

"That all bills for raising or appropriating money and for fixing the salaries of the officers of the Government of the United States shall originate in the first branch of the Legislature, and shall not be altered or amended by the second branch; and that no money shall be drawn from the public Treasury but in pursuance of appropriations to be originated by the first branch."

On the vote as to whether it should stand as a part of the committee's report, there were—yeas 5, nays 3, divided 3.

And on the question as to whether the vote so standing was determined in the affirmative, it was decided as follows: yeas 9, nays 2.

And again, on July 16, 1787, a report from the grand committee, embodying the same clause, was adopted by a vote of—yeas 5, nays 4, divided 1.

And finally, on September 8, 1787, the following clause, which is the language of the Constitution, was adopted by a vote of 9 to 2:

"All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments, as on other bills."

In Mr. Madison's Debates in the Federal Convention, page 376, it is shown that on August 6, 1787, the committee of detail, to whom was referred on July 25 the proceedings of the convention, reported a draught of the Constitution, article 4, section 5, of which read:

"All bills for raising or appropriating money and for fixing the salaries of the officers of Government shall originate in the House of Representatives, and shall not be altered or amended by the Senate. No money shall be drawn from the public Treasury but in pursuance of appropriations that shall originate in the House of Representatives."

In the subsequent proceedings of the convention this section was struck out, upon which occasion Colonel Mason said, "To strike out the section was to unhinge the compromise of which it made a part. The duration of the Senate made it improper. He does not object to that duration; on the contrary he approved of it. But, joined with the smallness of the number, it was an argument against adding this to the other great powers vested in that body. His idea of an aristocracy was that it was the government of the few over the many. An aristocratic body, like the screw mechanics, working its way by slow degrees, and holding fast whatever it gains, should ever be suspected of an encroaching tendency. The purse-string should never be put into its hands."

Mr. Mercer said he "considered the exclusive power of originating money bills as so great an advantage that it rendered the equality of votes in the Senate ideal, and of no consequence."

On the next day Mr. Randolph "expressed his dissatisfaction at the disagreement on yesterday to section 5 concerning money bills, as endangering the success of the plan, and extremely objectionable in itself, and gave notice that he should move for a reconsideration of the vote."

Page 410. Mr. Randolph moved, according to notice, to reconsider article 4, section 5, concerning money bills, which had been struck out.

He argued, first, that he had not wished for this privilege while a proportional representation in the Senate was in contemplation; but since an equality had been fixed in that House, the large States would require this compensation at least. Secondly, that it would make the plan more acceptable to the people, because they will consider the Senate as the more aristocratic body, and will expect that the usual guards against its influence will be provided, according to the example of Great Britain. Thirdly, the privilege will give some advantage to the House of Representatives, if it extends to the originating only; but still more if it restrains the Senate from amending. Fourthly, he called on the smaller States to concur in the measure as the condition by which alone the compromise had entitled them to an equality in the Senate. He signified that he should propose, instead of the original section, a clause specifying that the bills in question should be for the purpose of revenue in order to repel the objection against the extent of the words "raising money," which might happen incidentally; and that the Senate should not so amend or alter as to increase or diminish the sum, in order to obviate the inconveniences urged against a restriction of the Senate to a simple affirmation or negative.

On the question to reconsider there were—yeas 9, nays 1, divided 1.

The question next came up (see page 510) in a report by Mr. Brearly, from the committee of eleven, as follows:

"All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives and shall be subject to alterations and amendments by the Senate. No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law."

Mr. Gouverneur Morris (page 511) moved to postpone its consideration, stating that "it had been agreed to in the committee on the ground of compromise, and he should feel himself at liberty to dissent from it if on the whole he should not be satisfied with certain other parts to be settled."

The motion to postpone was carried—yeas 9, nays 2.

On page 514 Mr. King observed "that the influence of the small States in the Senate was somewhat balanced * * * by the concurrence of the small States in the committee in the clause vesting the exclusive origination of money bills in the House of Representatives."

To which remarks Mr. Madison appends the following note:

"This explains the compromise alluded to by Mr. Gouverneur Morris. Colonel Mason, Mr. Gerry, and other members from large States set great value on this privilege of originating money bills. Of this the members from the small States, with some from the large States, who wished a high-mounted Government, endeavored to avail themselves, by making that privilege the price of arrangements in the Constitution favorable to the small States, and to the elevation of the Government."

On page 529 the question was finally settled as follows:

"It was moved to strike out the words 'and shall be subject to alterations and amendments by the Senate,' and insert the words 'but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments, as in other bills,' which was agreed to nem. con."

To which Mr. Madison appended a foot-note as follows:

"This was a conciliatory vote, the effect of the compromise formerly alluded to."

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with; and the Clerk proceeded to read the bill by paragraphs for amendments.

The following paragraph was read:

Capitol police:

For one captain, $1,600; three lieutenants, at $1,200 each; twenty-one privates, at $1,000 each; and six watchmen, at $900 each; in all, $31,600, one-half to be paid into the contingent fund of the Senate, and the other half to be paid into the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

Mr. ATKINS. I offer the following amendment:

Add after line 125 the following:

For contingent fund, $100.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DUNNELL. I offer the following amendment:

In line 120, strike out "$1,000" and insert "$1,100."

I understand the compensation of the privates of the Capitol police force at the present time is $1,100. The captain receive $1,600 and the lieutenants $1,200 each. I think if the compensation of the privates be placed at $1,000 it is too low.

The amount of compensation now allowed is certainly as low as ought to be given to any men performing the duties of policemen here about this Capitol. Most of these men are men with families, and the compensation here furnished is not equal to their wants. I have no personal interest in any watchman or policeman about this Capitol, but the former compensation was $1,200 a year, and it was reduced in the last appropriation bill to $1,100, and I propose to give the same compensation for the next year as was given for the last, and I hope the committee will agree to that.

Mr. ATKINS. We have simply reduced the salaries of the privates on the Capitol police force from $1,100 to $1,000. These gentlemen remain within the walls of this Capitol pretty much; they are protected from the weather and are not subjected to the same exposure or dangers as the police of cities are as a usual thing, and considering the great fall in prices of all the necessities of life and that we have got almost to bed-rock, so far as those necessities are concerned, I think this is good pay for the men who stand around this Capitol called policemen, with hardly any duties to perform. Besides that, if you will contrast the cost of the police force of this Capitol with the cost of the police force of the British Parliament you will see that we have been paying within the last four or five years more than twice as much as they pay in the British Parliament. I believe they pay there only $14,000 a year for the entire police force of the Houses of Parliament, while we pay $33,600.

Now it will be no argument for any gentleman to say, "Oh, will you compare free America with a monarchical government?" It is too late to make such arguments as that upon a question of dollars and cents.

The labor which these gentlemen perform is not greater than the same class of men performs in the British Parliament houses, and it seems to me that when we propose to give our policemen $2.50 per day, while the police employed in the British houses of Parliament get only $1 a day, I think we are quite liberal in the appropriation we have made.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For one laborer, $820; four laborers at $600 each; one telegraph-operator, $400.

Mr. ATKINS. In line 154 I propose, after the word "laborer," to insert the words "in the bath-room," and to strike out "8" and insert in lieu thereof "7," so that it will read:

For one laborer in the bath-room $720.

I will state to the House that my object in offering this amendment is to assign this salary to the man who keeps the bath-room under the House of Representatives.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For clerk to the Committee of Ways and Means, $2,500; assistant clerk, $1,200; clerk to the Committee on Appropriations, $2,500; assistant clerk, $1,200; clerk to the Committee of Claims, clerk to the Committee on the Public Lands, clerk to the Committee on War Claims, and clerk to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, at $2,000 each.

Mr. REAGAN. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether the several committee clerks mentioned in this clause have received the compensation here provided heretofore?

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, sir; their salary is fixed by law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas offer an amendment?

Mr. REAGAN. No, sir; I did not know that all the salaries of these clerks were fixed by law, although I knew that some of them were.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For one chief engineer, $1,400; two assistant engineers, $1,300 each; five firemen, at $900 each. And all engineers and others who are engaged in heating and ventilating the House shall be subject to the orders, and in all respects under the direction of the Architect of the Capitol, subject to the control of the Speaker, and no removal or appointment shall be made except with his approval.

Mr. ATKINS. I move, in line 181, after the word "each," to insert the words "and one laborer."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move to amend by adding to the clause the words "and except for cause," so that it shall read: "and no removal or appointment shall be made except with his approval and except for cause." That is in strict harmony with the theory of civil-service reform, and I think there can be no objection to it. It simply provides that there shall be no removals in this department except for cause.

Mr. ATKINS. I certainly do not think that the amendment ought to be offered because I think it is rather a reflection upon the appointing officer and the Speaker. Surely the Speaker would not approve of a removal unless for cause.

Mr. DUNNELL. The amendment applies to the Architect of the Capitol.

Mr. ATKINS. It applies both to the Speaker and to the Architect.

Mr. DUNNELL. I understand that there is good reason for the amendment, and I have offered it in good faith and with no expectation that it would reflect either upon the Architect or the Speaker.

Mr. ATKINS. It is very unusual to hamper the appointing power with any such restriction as that. I do not believe the gentleman can find, if he searches through all the Departments of the Government, any restriction of that sort; or if he does it will only be in some few cases. As a general thing the appointing power has no such restriction placed upon it.

I will state further that, as the House is aware, these officers were formerly under the Doorkeeper; but the Committee on Appropriations, after considering the subject mutually, thought that as the Architect of the Capitol has charge of the Capitol, and as these engineers are especially the persons in charge of the ventilation of the Hall and keeping it at the proper temperature, they should be placed under the control of the Architect of the Capitol instead of the Doorkeeper, who knows nothing about their business. The Architect knows all about their business, while the Doorkeeper, by virtue of his office, is not supposed to know anything about their duties. Hence we placed them under the control of the Architect.

Mr. REAGAN. As I shall vote for this amendment, I desire to state briefly my reason for doing so. I think the principle of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] is correct. While it applies in this case to but a single officer, I am willing that it shall be applied to him, and I would be glad to have an opportunity of applying it in all cases, to all the subordinate officers about the Senate and House and in all the Departments. I think they should not be removed for mere capriciousness or from favor or for political considerations, but when appointed they should not be removed during the term for which they were appointed without cause, for misconduct or incapacity.

Mr. HOUSE. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of calling the attention of the gentleman who offered this amendment to the fact that it does not make sense, [laughter.] and for that reason I think it ought not to be adopted. His amendment says that no removal or appointment shall be made except with the approval of the Speaker or for cause. Now, does the gentleman want to provide that no appointment shall be made except for cause?

Mr. DUNNELL. I will modify my amendment.

Mr. HOUSE. I think it needs modification.

Mr. DUNNELL. I modify my amendment so that it shall read "no appointment shall be made except with his approval, and no removal except for cause."

The amendment, as modified, was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

For fourteen messengers on the soldiers' roll, at $1,000 each.

Mr. DEERING. I move to amend the clause just read by adding the following:

Provided, That the messengers served in the Union Army.

Mr. ATKINS. I am willing to accept that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

For eighteen messengers, at $1,000 each; seven laborers, at $600 each; ten laborers, during the session, at the rate of $720 each per annum; one laborer, at $600; one laborer, (Henry Douglas,) at $840; one laborer, at $600; and for one female attendant in ladies' retiring-room, $600.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. I move to amend by inserting, after the words "one laborer at $600," these words:

Eight laborers in charge of cleaning the Hall of the House, known as "cloak room men," at $50 per month during the session.

My object in offering this amendment is to make this appropriation bill in this particular accord as nearly as possible with what has been the actual payments for this purpose during more than twelve years past, as is proved by evidence taken before one of the committees in this House on that subject. We have for this long period been in the habit of paying these cloak-room men by special resolution at the end of the session. That is an inconsistency which should cease.

The pay of these men has hitherto been larger than proposed by my amendment. I have made it $50 per month so that it will accord with the sum fixed by the Committee on Appropriations for other laborers. I would say also that the number employed heretofore has been ten, but the Committee on Civil-Service Reform have agreed to report in favor of eight, believing that to be a sufficient number.

Mr. ATKINS. Does this amendment come from the Committee on Civil-Service Reform?

Mr. COX, of Ohio. I have not been instructed to offer this amendment, but I know the Committee on Civil-Service Reform are unanimously in favor of it.

Mr. ATKINS. I will not object to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following: For Chaplain of the House, $900.

Mr. MCKENZIE. I move to amend by striking out "$900" and inserting "$1,000." I want to pay the man who prays for us as much as we pay for a man to open the door.

Mr. ATKINS. I believe this amendment is subject to the point of order that it changes existing law and is not in the line of retrenchment. The salary of the Chaplain has always been $900.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following: For twenty-five pages, while actually employed, (including three riding-pages,) at $60 per month, and for hire of horses, ($500,) $6,500.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I desire to say that members here are very much embarrassed by want of copies of this bill; half of us have no copies of the bill.

Mr. ATKINS. The usual number was printed. I do not know whose fault it is that copies cannot be obtained.

Mr. BLOUNT. The copies of the bill have been taken from the document-room.

The CHAIRMAN. Perhaps the gentleman will find the bill on his file.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. No; it is not on our files, and I shall soon move that the further consideration of this bill be suspended until we can obtain copies of it.

The Clerk read as follows:

For twenty-five pages while actually employed, (including three riding-pages,) at $60 per month, and for hire of horses, ($500,) $6,500.

Mr. CHALMERS. I move to amend by striking out "twenty-five pages," and inserting "twenty-eight pages." The Committee of Accounts have given considerable examination and discussion to this subject. We find that there are now twenty-nine pages on this floor, twenty-eight being authorized by law and one by special resolution of the House. Members must all be aware that the present force is not greater than is needed. I hope, therefore, that we shall retain at least the number we now have.

Mr. ATKINS. I dislike very much to make a speech against the "boys," and I do not believe I will. Without making any suggestion at all I will allow the vote to be taken.

The amendment of Mr. CHALMERS was agreed to; there being ayes 71, noes not counted.

Mr. CLYMER. I move to amend by inserting after the words "riding-pages," in line 255, the words "and one telegraphic page."

Mr. ATKINS. Is it the design of the amendment that this telegraphic-page shall be one of the twenty-eight?

Mr. CLYMER. Yes, sir. Perhaps the amendment might be put in better form.

Mr. DURHAM. I move to amend by striking out the words "including three riding-pages" and inserting "three of whom shall be riding-pages and one of whom shall be page to the telegraphic operator."

Mr. CLYMER. That is more accurate; I accept it as a modification of my amendment.

Mr. McMAHON. I understand that we have never had more than one riding page.

Mr. ATKINS. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] will withdraw his amendment I will offer one to cover the same object.

Mr. CLYMER. I withdraw it.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to amend so that the clause will read, "including two riding pages and a telegraphic page." These will be a part of the twenty-eight.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) There is some mistake about this matter. We have never had more than one riding page. As to the other page who is removed from service on the floor, his duty is to receive and distribute documents coming from the Executive Departments. As these pages come directly under my official notice, I feel warranted in saying that I think there need be but one riding page.

Mr. ATKINS. I am very willing to modify my amendment so as to read "including one riding page and one telegraphic page."

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Then another page can be assigned to the duty I have spoken of.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. As this paragraph has been amended so as to authorize three more pages, it will be necessary to change the footing. I ask consent that the Clerk be authorized to do this.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation of the Public Printer, $13,600; for chief clerk, (whose appointment is hereby authorized,) $2,900; two clerks of class four; one clerk of class three; one clerk of class two; one clerk of class one; in all, $13,400.

Mr. FINLEY. I desire to inquire whether the "chief clerk" spoken of in this paragraph has been heretofore authorized by law.

Mr. ATKINS. I will state frankly to the gentleman that he has not been.

Mr. FINLEY. Then I make the point of order that this office cannot be created in the present bill. I wish to say—

Mr. ATKINS. There is no use making a speech upon the subject. If the point of order is insisted upon, the clause must go out.

Mr. FINLEY. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations how many clerks are now in the employ of the Public Printer and what are their salaries.

Mr. ATKINS. This bill provides for the same number now employed.

Mr. FINLEY. I desire to say to the gentleman that within the last six months the Public Printer has increased the number of his clerks and increased their salaries, as I understand, without any authority of law and, as I believe from information in my possession, without any necessity. He has increased by two the number of salaried clerks, though there is no more business done in that office now than there was under his predecessor. He has also, as I have said, increased the salaries of these clerks. I am satisfied that the proper transaction of the business of the Public Printer does not require such a number of clerks. I am not captious about this matter; but I have been recently examining this question—

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Is there not a point of order pending?

The CHAIRMAN. There is.

Mr. FINLEY. I thought the point of order was acceded to.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has not yet been disposed of. Will the gentleman again state it?

Mr. FINLEY. My point of order is that the bill in providing for a chief clerk whose salary is fixed at $2,000 goes beyond the authority of existing law and proposes new legislation. The Committee on Appropriations admit, I understand, that there is no law authorizing the office of chief clerk of the Public Printer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands it to be conceded by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that this clause is a change of existing law. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. ATKINS. If the gentleman insists upon the point of order the clause must go out. The Committee on Appropriations was well aware that the paragraph was subject to a point of order, for there is no law authorizing us to increase the salary of this officer to $2,000 and constitute him a chief clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman insists on the point of order the Chair has no alternative but to sustain it.

Mr. ATKINS. Does the gentleman insist on it.

Mr. FINLEY. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. DURHAM. The bill will have to be changed. We reorganized that department. There were four clerks of class four and one clerk of class three, but we made a chief clerk, giving him $2,000, and reduced the four clerks of class four to two. If that is stricken out, then there ought to be three clerks of class four to supply the deficiency.

Mr. FINLEY. Does it make an aggregate saving?

Mr. DURHAM. It does.

Mr. FINLEY. What is the pay of these clerks? This bill does not fix the pay of any of them except the salary of the chief clerk.

Mr. CLYMER. That is fixed by law, different pay for a different class of clerks.

Mr. ATKINS. The amount is exactly the same in this bill as in the present law, $13,400, exactly the same amount.

Mr. POTTER. Only differently distributed?

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, sir. They are reclassified, that is all. If the gentleman insists on his point of order it will be necessary to have three clerks of class four instead of two clerks.

Mr. FINLEY. I was not aware of that fact. I thought the appropriation was an increase over the present law.

Mr. ATKINS. No, sir.

Mr. FINLEY. If there is no increase of appropriation then I withdraw my point of order.

Mr. ATKINS. It has not been increased a single dollar.

Mr. FINLEY. I withdraw my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The paragraph will stand as it is.

Mr. MILLS. I move the committee rise; this is Saturday and we have done a good day's work.

Mr. DURHAM. No; let us go on a half hour longer.

The committee refused to rise.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. BACON. I make the point of order we are proceeding without a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BACON. Then I move the committee rise.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 16, noes 105.

The CHAIRMAN. No further count being demanded the Chair will declare the motion rejected.

Mr. BACON. I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. McMAHON. That comes too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will order tellers, in order to determine whether there is a quorum present or not.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask the gentleman to allow us to run on until half-past four o'clock, and then we will agree to the motion that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection to that understanding, and the motion to rise is disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Commissioner of Customs: For Commissioner of Customs, $4,000; deputy commissioner, $2,250; two chiefs of divisions, at $2,100 each; two clerks of class 4; four clerks of class 3; eight clerks of class 2; nine clerks of class 1; three clerks, at $1,000 each; one assistant messenger; and one laborer; in all, $46,770.

Mr. ATKINS. I move in line 459 to strike out "eight" and insert "ten," so it will read "ten clerks of class 2," instead of eight clerks of class 2.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. I now move that the amount appropriated be increased to correspond with the amendment just adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection; and it is ordered accordingly.

The Clerk read as follows:

First Auditor:

For the First Auditor of the Treasury, $3,600; deputy auditor, $2,250; five chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; four clerks of class 4; nine clerks of class 3; nine clerks of class 2; fourteen clerks of class 1; six clerks, at $1,000 each; three clerks, at $900 each; two assistant messengers; one page, $460; and for laborers, $2,400; in all, $79,870. And so much of sections of the Revised Statutes numbered 276 and 277 as authorizes the appointment and fixes the salary of a Fifth Auditor for the Treasury Department is hereby repealed and the office is abolished. And all acts and parts of acts now in force relating to and prescribing the duties of the same shall apply to the office of the First Auditor of the Treasury Department; and their fulfillment shall devolve on and be performed under the direction of the incumbent of the said office, who shall be responsible for the same.

Mr. BRIGGS. I rise for the purpose of moving an amendment to that paragraph.

Mr. PAGE. I reserve the point of order until we hear what reason can be given by the committee for the abolition of the office of Fifth Auditor.

Mr. ATKINS. It is very evident this will lead to some contest, and therefore as we have now reached the adjourning hour I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. EDEN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration a bill (H. R. No. 4104) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. ATKINS. I move by unanimous consent an additional number, say 300 copies, of the legislative appropriation bill be printed for the use of the House, as the number already printed has been exhausted.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

SURVEYS OF CONNECTICUT RIVER.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to furnish to the House of Representatives as soon as practicable a report in detail of the surveys and examinations of the Connecticut River between Hartford, in Connecticut, and Holyoke, in Massachusetts, made since 1867 under the direction of the War Department.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I move that the House do now adjourn.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Pending the motion to adjourn, by unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted, as follows:

To Mr. BAGLEY, for ten days;

To Mr. HUBBELL, for one week, from Monday next, on account of important business; and

To Mr. BRIGHT, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

FRANÇOIS CAZEAU.

Mr. NORCROSS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 3060) for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of François Cazeau, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

The motion that the House adjourn was then agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BOUCK: The petition of the publisher of the Shawano County (Wisconsin) Journal, for the abolition of the duty on type—to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Also, the petition of citizens of Wisconsin, relative to the price paid for labor on public works—to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. BRIDGES: The petition of William H. Snowden and over 2,000 other citizens of Lehigh Valley, Pennsylvania, against the passage of the Wood tariff bill—to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

By Mr. DIBRELL: The petition of 154 citizens of Chattanooga, Tennessee, that a pension be granted to James M. Allison, a veteran soldier of the Mexican war, on account of wounds received at Cerro Gordo—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FORNEY: The petition of G. A. Prinz, mayor of Callman, Alabama, and other citizens of said city, that aid be granted the Texas Pacific Railroad, provided its eastern terminus is located at Vicksburg, Mississippi—to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. WINDOM moved that the maps accompanying the report be referred to the Committee on Printing; which was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives in reference to the bill (H. J. H. BEHRENS, Corresponding Secretary.

Hon. W. A. WHEELER,
Vice-President, &c., United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. McCREERY. Mr. President, I take pleasure in presenting the credentials of my successor in office, Hon. John S. Williams, who has been elected by the Legislature of Kentucky to a seat in the Senate for the term beginning on the 4th of March next. His experience in affairs and his acknowledged ability will render him a useful, and he will make himself an agreeable, member of this body.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The credentials will be read.
The credentials were read and ordered to be filed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a resolution of the Board of Trade of Mobile, Alabama, in favor of the passage of House bill No. 3385, to organize the life-saving service; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the American Society of Civil Engineers, in favor of an appropriation for the purpose of continuing the triangulations of the Coast Survey where the Legislatures of the States shall make provision for the same; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of the United States, in favor of a commercial highway by water between the Mississippi River and Lake Michigan via the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. McCREERY. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a petition signed by many of the most eminent citizens of Kentucky, of all professions and of all political parties, praying that Americus Symmes may be assigned to an official position in Captain Howgate's expedition to the north pole. His father was not only a meritorious naval commander, but he was a philosopher and devoted much of his time to the study of the polar regions. More than fifty years ago he delivered many lectures on the subject. His theories received little consideration at the time, but it is now contended by the petitioners that research and exploration have in some measure established the truth of what was then regarded as a speculation or a dream. The son, with becoming reverence and in the strict line of filial duty, anxiously seeks an opportunity of vindicating the memory of his father by placing his name where he believes it belongs, among the pioneers of a branch of knowledge still in its infancy.

Impelled by these high motives and armed with the facts and deductions of his celebrated ancestor, his presence in the expedition would be a touching tribute to the dead and an encouragement to the living patiently and cheerfully to endure the hardships and privations of a voyage from which there may be no return.

I have never seen a petition which presented in the signatures a more imposing array of talent and learning, nor one more heavily charged with intellectual and moral force. I feel a comforting assurance that the Committee on Naval Affairs will yield readily and gracefully to their wishes. I move its reference to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY presented the petition of Mrs. Sarah C. Abbot, of Warren, Rhode Island, widow of the late Trevett Abbot, commander of the United States Navy, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of B. B. Taylor, commander in the United States Navy, praying for inquiry and suitable legislation to remedy an injustice, as he alleges, in passing him over in promotion; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented the memorial of George W. Newball and others, citizens of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the passage of any act imposing a tax on incomes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of Isaiah Chase and others, citizens of Barnstable, Massachusetts, masters in the merchant marine, and the memorial of the Boston Board of Underwriters, and the memorial of the Boston Board of Trade, remonstrating against the proposed transfer of the life-saving service from the Treasury to the Navy Department; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the memorial of the Providence Tool Company, remonstrating against the passage of section 19 of the bill (S. No. 300) to amend the statutes in relation to patents, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I present the petition of M. McCullough and others, owners and officers of steam-vessels at Cincinnati, Ohio, praying that Congress will take action on the House bill No. 2478, which has been pending before the Committee on Commerce since the 25th of January last, and asking that, inasmuch as in their opinion the provisions of the bill are so vital to steam-navigation interests all over the United States and especially to those of the Mississippi Valley, its passage may be immediate. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSTON presented the petition of T. G. Senseney and other heirs of the estate of Jacob Senseney, deceased, praying compensation for the use and occupancy of certain property belonging to the estate of the decedent at Winchester, Virginia, by United States troops during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. THURMAN presented the memorial of Samuel M. White, jr., and others, citizens of Ohio, remonstrating against the proposed transfer of the life-saving service from the Treasury to the Navy Department; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SARGENT. I present a memorial from the Board of Trade and citizens of Vallejo, California, in favor of an appropriation to continue the construction of the stone dry-dock at the Mare Island navy-yard, for which purpose the appropriations have been slight or omitted of late. The memorialists state that these sectional docks are now twenty years old and suffering the weakness of age and use and deteriorating rapidly; that the greatest care is needed in operating them to prevent accidents with loss of property and life; that $45,000 was the sum estimated to be required for their repair with an annual outlay of $7,000 to maintain them in working order. They say that there has been over $1,000,000 already appropriated for the stone dry-dock now building, and without the expenditure of enough more to complete it the amount already appropriated will have been substantially a total loss; that the coffer-dam put up for temporary purposes will stand but for a year or two and is liable to give way, in which case it would necessitate an enormous expense to the Government. They ask, therefore, that an appropriation may be made sufficient to complete this necessary work. I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT presented a memorial of Ben Franklin & Co., publishers and proprietors of the Redding Independent, of Redding, California, in favor of a duty of thirty cents per pound being levied on all stereotype and electrotype plates imported into the United States, and remonstrating against any action being taken by Congress in favor of a petition presented in the interest of the foreign type-founders' agency in San Francisco for the abolition of the duty on printing-type; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. INGALLS presented the petition of Thomas Cott and 55 other citizen Indians of Kansas, praying for an adjustment of their affairs with various tribes; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented the petition of S. B. Cole and others, praying that arrears of pension be allowed to Charles Harrison, who served during the late war as a private in Company C, First Nebraska Volunteer Infantry; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of W. D. Sash and others, citizens of Rush County, Kansas, praying that Daniel Smith, a citizen of the same county, be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of James McCracken, of Camden, New Jersey, late a seaman in the United States Navy, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I present the petition of Mrs. Lucia B. Peck, of Burlington, Vermont, with sundry accompanying papers, praying for relief for what she considers to have been the illegal imprisonment of her husband in the old Capitol prison here during the war. I am a little in doubt whether it ought to go to the Committee on Claims or to the Committee on Military Affairs; but I rather think it should go to the Committee on Military Affairs, as it is not a definite claim.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HOWE presented the memorial of F. C. Suhrer, remonstrating against the confirmation of a claim made by Anna M. Clark to certain lands in Florida; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. CONKLING presented a memorial numerously signed by members of the Maritime Association of New York, in favor of an amendment of the laws of the United States touching commerce and navigation; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COCKRELL presented additional papers in relation to the application of Emma Isabella Crain, formerly Smith, of McLean County, Illinois, for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. KIRKWOOD presented the memorial of George W. Clark and others, citizens of Iowa; the petition of Nicholas Grensel and others, citizens of Iowa; the petition of William Campbell and others, citizens of Iowa; and the petition of Noble Warwick and others, citizens of Iowa, remonstrating against the making of pensions payable in the city of Washington; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MAXEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 757) to provide for building a military post for the protection of the northern frontier of Montana, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SAULSBURY, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 150) for the relief of William McIndoe, postmaster at Lonaconing, in Alleghany County, Maryland, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3071) for the relief of Samuel R. Atwell, late postmaster at Winchester, Virginia, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1315) for the relief of C. H. Walker, postmaster at Frostburgh, in Alleghany County, Maryland, reported it without amendment.

Mr. ROLLINS. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4425) to alter and amend a law of the District of Columbia relative to the inspection of flour, to report it with an amendment striking out in the twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth lines the word "inspection," and inserting "inspector;" and I ask that the bill may be considered at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I trust that the members of the Committee on the District of Columbia will not insist upon reporting important measures and asking their present consideration. We shall be compelled, a number of us, to interpose objections to such an irregular mode of transacting very important business. We are not in the habit of proceeding to the present consideration of bills coming from other committees when they are reported, and I see no reason or excuse why bills coming from the Committee on the District of Columbia should always be brought up and acted upon as soon as reported. I ask that the bill take its regular course and that it be placed on the Calendar to come up as the other legitimate business of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made to the present consideration of the bill, and it will take its place on the Calendar.

Mr. DORSEY. I think the statement of the Senator from Missouri is entirely uncalled for. The members of the Committee on the District of Columbia have not been in the habit of reporting bills and asking for their immediate consideration. On the contrary, I fancy the District Committee has occupied as little of the time of the Senate as any other committee of the body, and this is the first bill, I venture to say, this winter the immediate consideration of which was asked by the committee when it was reported. I did not know at the time that the Senator having charge of the bill was going to ask its immediate consideration; but the whole bill which the Senator says is so very important simply amounts to reducing the fee which the inspector of flour in the District gets from two cents a barrel to one cent a barrel. That is all the importance of the bill.

Mr. ROLLINS. Will the Senator from Missouri withdraw his objection that I may say a word?

Mr. COCKRELL. I rise to a question of order. The bill is not before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has gone over under the objection.

Mr. ROLLINS. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me to correct the error into which he has fallen?

Mr. COCKRELL. When the bill comes up in its regular order we can discuss its points.

Mr. ROLLINS. The Senator from Missouri ought not to have occupied the time of the Senate to make an erroneous statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. BAILEY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 849) granting a pension to James C. Downer, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1975) to amend an act granting a pension to William Hartford, of South Yarmouth, Massachusetts, approved May 8, 1874, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 932) granting a pension to Cornelius Le Roy, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 978) granting a pension to Hiram M. Kuhn, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 524) granting a pension to Lemuel L. Lawrence, late second lieutenant Company B in the Sixth Regiment Illinois Cavalry Volunteers, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 13) for the relief of Amy King, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Portman Swafford, late of Company D, Fifth Tennessee Mounted Infantry, praying to be allowed a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. BRUCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Otho W. Beal, praying to be allowed a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Phebe Wilson, praying to be allowed a pension on account of the services of her husband, William Wilson, in the war of 1812, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 744) granting a pension to Sarah McCooly, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONKLING. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to make a report in answer to a resolution instructing that committee to inquire into the purposes for which the New York post-office building may properly be used. I may say that this is the unanimous report of the committee. I move that it be printed and laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WADLEIGH. The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 387) to correct the date of commission of certain officers of the Quartermaster's Department, have considered the same and instruct me to report adversely and recommend that the bill do not pass. There will be in this case a report of a minority of the committee, and I ask that both reports be printed.

Mr. MAXEY. I am instructed by the minority of the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 387) to correct the date of commission of certain officers of the Quartermaster's Department, to submit the views of the minority, and to move that they be printed with the report of the majority.

The motion was agreed to.

ISLAND OF CUBA.

Mr. CONOVER. Mr. President, some weeks ago I submitted a resolution, which is now upon the Calendar, calling upon the President for special information relative to affairs in Cuba. I ask the Senate to take up that resolution now, in order to indulge me in some very brief remarks upon it.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. CONOVER March 20th:

Resolved, That the President is hereby requested to communicate to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, such information as the Government has received respecting the terms and conditions under which the surrender of the Cuban insurgents has been made, together with such other information in his possession respecting the future policy of Spain in the government of the island of Cuba.

Mr. CONOVER. Mr. President, I desire to state very briefly the considerations which have induced me to call upon the President for the information referred to in this resolution. I shall not occupy the time of the Senate with any extended remarks.

It is the good fortune of this Government not only to be at peace with all other nations, but to have set an example to the world of peaceful arbitration in great questions of national concern; and we are now conducting our diplomatic intercourse with all nations in a spirit of mutual concession and with an earnest determination to avoid all violent methods of redress.

We cannot lose sight of the fact, however, that the interests of this country in connection with the Spanish government are somewhat involved. The public policy of Spain in its colonial government on this continent has been for half a century of such a character as to greatly injure the commercial interests of the United States. It has been a policy of repression and rapacity. It is a traditional policy, deliberately conceived in a period when liberal ideas were only germinating.

The tenacity with which Spain resists all efforts to create mutual interests and its blind adhesion to old usages demonstrate the evil spirit which denies the universal demands of the age. The colonial policy of Spain has been the fruitful source of all the trouble experienced by this Government in regard to the rights of American citizens in Spanish dominions. No other government has so often and so seriously provoked the popular indignation of this country. No other government has so defiantly menaced the peaceful relations of the two countries. No other nation so persistently refuses to be guided in its public policy by those wise considerations recognized by the enlightened judgment of the world. For all these reasons, the people of this country are deeply concerned in whatever pertains to the political condition of Cuba.

It may seem surprising, but I think I am correct in the statement that our trade with Cuba, in the aggregate, is second only to what it is with Great Britain. It amounts to nearly $100,000,000 annually, equal to one-tenth of the total export and import trade of South and Central America, the entire West Indies, and Mexico. But we sell to Cuba only $15,000,000 to $20,000,000 a year, while we purchase from $75,000,000 to $80,000,000 a year. This large traffic has grown out of the actual necessities of trade with Cuba, and in spite of the oppressive restrictions imposed by the Spanish government upon commercial intercourse with this country. The balance of $50,000,000 in favor of Spanish merchants and planters in Cuba is the result of what is no more nor less than an infamous system of commercial pillage and administrative corruption.

The policy of Spain in Cuba has been tolerated by this Government through sheer necessity. In vain the United States has remonstrated through the customary channels of official intercourse. Equally useless have been the measures of retaliation, such as discriminating tonnage dues and prohibiting duties on Cuba coffee. Seven-tenths of the export trade of Cuba is with the United States. But what do we exchange in products of this country? American producers are confronted by a prohibitory impost on the introduction of flour into Cuba of seven or eight dollars a barrel, and by tonnage dues and port charges so excessive and arbitrary as to seriously injure the commerce of this country with that island.

The enormous tax upon American breadstuffs amounts to about 150 per cent., and yet to make good bread for the million and a half population of Cuba a competent authority says it is necessary to add to Spanish flour a fifth part at least of the American article. Not only flour, but rice, lard, butter, cheese, salt fish, and beef, common commodities, are subject to more or less rigorous imposts, only occasionally modified by necessity. Not one dollar, not the remotest advantage of this restrictive policy inures to the benefit of the real producer. The farmer in Spain gets not a penny more for his grain than if the ports of Cuba were open to the world. But the speculator is enriched, and between the speculating class and the Government officials in Cuba a system has been devised which cheats the Government itself of its revenues, creates local power in the hands of a grasping and unprincipled class of adventurers from Spain, who have the ability and the resources to defy all measures of commercial reform or of political progress.

It is hardly necessary, Mr. President, that I should add details to this general statement. Every Senator is aware of the condition of our commercial interests in Cuba and of the vast opportunity which might occur for the expansion of our trade and commerce in that direction. For years we have been trying to obtain a revision of the treaty of 1795 with Spain. It was generally understood, four years ago, that Mr. Cushing was sent to Spain by President Grant as much for this special object as for the amicable settlement of the Virginias case. But what has resulted in regard to the treaty? Absolutely nothing. Mr. Cushing was recalled and Mr. Lowell, the poet, is now supposed to be employed in negotiating a new treaty of commerce.

It may not be generally known, yet Senators will probably recur to the event, that in 1818 and for some years subsequent the commercial interests of this country with Cuba were on a vastly better footing than they are to-day. Restrictions on the trade of foreign nations with Cuba were then abolished. The island had a political representation. The population augmented wonderfully. Its prosperity received a remarkable impetus. A comparatively liberal and wise policy was then pursued by the Spanish government in the administration of its colonial affairs.

But there are higher considerations than these, Mr. President, which to my mind compel this Government to watch with careful solicitude the policy of Spain in regard to Cuba. The duty of the Government in protecting American rights and interests in Cuba has been attended with many difficulties. The tendency has been to compromise the friendly relations which fortunately have been preserved, and I trust will ever exist, between the United States and Spain. We have always had a large class of individual interests to take care of. The settlement of these cases has involved reclamations and indemnities and apologies which seem to have kept the governing officials of both countries continually bowing to each other, with the disadvantage to the Spanish officials of having to occasionally put their hands in their pockets. But all these apologies and indemnities do not remove the cause of the perpetual trouble which this Government suffers at the hands of Cuba.

Apologies may gratify a sense of honor and dignity. Money indemnities may satisfy the wrongs of claimants. But do we wish a continuance of this state of things? Is there no safeguard by which a nation can secure justice and peace for the future? Does an indemnity of $80,000 sufficiently compensate for the barbarous massacre in cold blood of the fifty-three passengers and crew of the Virginus? Is any such policy to be tolerated or such a practice in the administration of any civilized government recognized which allows first a wanton crime and then receives payment for it in gold and apologies?

Mr. President, the whole record of Spanish outrages, abuses, and injuries in Cuba has but one cause. There is one origin for all this wrong. There has never been an outrage upon justice, a deliberate defiance of international rights, a violation of international law, a want of respect for the universal sentiment of humanity, or any other arbitrary and unnatural course of conduct by the Spanish officials in Cuba that has not its origin in the policy of repression which the traditions of Spain still force upon the people of Cuba. Every assault upon the rights of American citizens and every act of injury to American interests is traceable directly to the malign spirit of oppression which has paralyzed every just and worthy aspiration of the Cuban people for improvement and self-government. You may take any instance of personal cruelty or of arbitrary exaction in the administration of that island and it will be found to be the legitimate offspring of the iniquitous colonial policy which is tolerated by other nations professing to be morally shocked at the crimes they tolerate. Why, sir, the liberal voice of the Spanish nation has proclaimed its utter detestation of the repressive measures of its colonial policy.

In the Spanish Cortes, in 1872, one of the most distinguished Spanish statesmen boldly asserted that the real rebels in Cuba were not the negro slaves seeking their personal freedom nor the native Cubans justly aspiring for civil liberty, but the real criminals were the Spanish volunteers—the resident slaveholders—who conspired to resist all measures of liberal reform. They were powerful enough to be able to check the successful execution of all intended reforms.

The line of public policy announced by Mr. Castellar in 1874 in regard to Cuba is an indication of what the liberal feeling in Spain recognizes and advocates.

First—

Said President Castellar—

the immediate abolition of slavery. Second, the autonomy of the islands of Porto Rico and Cuba, which shall have a parliamentary assembly of their own, their own administration, their own government, and a federal tie to unite them with Spain, as Canada is united with England, in order that we may found the liberty of those states and at the same time conserve the national integrity.

The Government of the United States, the people of this country, will joyfully hail the adoption of such a wise and just policy as this by the government of Spain. Time and again in its diplomatic intercourse with this country has the Spanish government assured us of its desire to establish liberal reforms in our commercial relations and in the political government of Cuba. But some excuse for inaction has invariably followed the expression of good intentions. The war of rebellion in Cuba since 1868, the civil war in Spain, the popular uprisings in Spanish provinces, seriously menacing the stability of the government, have been the pretexts for delay and evasion. These excuses no longer exist. Spain is at peace. It is now understood that the struggle of the Cubans has been abandoned by voluntary surrender. Overtures have been made by the Spanish government involving concessions which point substantially to the adoption of the reforms announced by Mr. Castellar. Is our information correct? Are we not concerned to know whether any such favorable change is to occur so vitally important to our commercial growth in Cuba and so suggestive of the beneficent progress of popular intelligence and good government?

Mr. President, I do not believe that any occasion can arise which would justify a departure from the well-settled American principle of non-interference in the domestic policy of other states. But I do believe that we may go a little further than Mr. Webster did in 1824 in interpreting the duty of this Government in relation to the Greek revolution. I think we can go a little further in the direction of a wise and just declaration of our American policy. The duty and mission of a popular representative government may be defined with larger latitude in this age of progress. Without violating our international obligations, without abusing the friendly character of our intercourse with nations, there are potential ways that should be adopted by which the popular judgment of this country may be impressed upon the civilization of the age. The interests of this country are not merely concerned as to who possesses the political sovereignty of Cuba. It is quite important to us to know how that sovereignty is to be exercised by whomsoever holds the de jure or de facto government. Spain cannot afford to long defy the enlightened opinion of the world. She cannot afford to insult and abuse the average conscience of this age of moral progress and of popular rights. Nor can it afford much longer to resist those reciprocal tendencies which trade and commerce develop and which will force conviction upon the reason of the people in spite of the most determined obstinacy.

The present situation in Cuba seems to be especially favorable for most important reforms in our commercial intercourse, and such reforms as will have equally fortunate results in the cause of humane and just government for the future in that island. I think the country demands that this subject shall not escape the attention of Congress.

I move the adoption of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. WINDOM, the bill (H. R. No. 4246) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, and the bill (H. R. No. 4549) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

BANKRUPT-LAW REPEAL.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I move to take from the table the bill to repeal the bankrupt law, which has been returned from the House of Representatives with two amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay the amendments of the House before the Senate.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Does the Senator from Michigan propose to put that bill on its passage?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I propose to move concurrence in the first amendment and to offer an amendment to the second amendment of the House.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I object to the present consideration of the bill, if I have a right under the rules of order to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio objects to its consideration to-day. It will go over.

Several SENATORS. Let it be referred.

Mr. MCCREERY. I object to the reference of the bill to repeal the bankrupt law.

Mr. McDONALD. There was no motion to refer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio objected to the present consideration. Now the Senator from Kentucky objects to a reference to the committee.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I think a reference to the committee is entirely unnecessary. I believe the members of the committee have considered the amendments and agreed to the first amendment and to an amendment to be offered to the second amendment of the House of Representatives. I think a reference is wholly unnecessary. It will only lead to delay.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments of the House will lie on the table with the bill.

THE CALENDAR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired, and the Senate proceeds to the consideration of the Calendar. The first case on the Calendar will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first case on the Calendar at the point where its consideration was left off on Thursday last is the bill (S. No. 864) to provide for the construction, maintenance, and operation of a military telegraph in Dakota and Montana Territories.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I inquire whether the resolutions on the Calendar do not come up in their order first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. We are not within the morning hour. The practice has been to take up bills after the expiration of the morning hour.

IMPROVEMENTS OF FOX AND WISCONSIN RIVERS.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Then I ask unanimous consent to consider and pass the resolution submitted by me on the 25th instant, asking for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can move to take it up.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I move to take it up.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to report to the Senate what amounts of money have been expended for improvements of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers and intersecting canal or canals in the State of Wisconsin; also, how much it will cost to complete the said improvements so as to make the same navigable and useful, and what public benefit has been or is likely to be derived from such improvements and expenditure; also, how much money has been expended for procuring the right of way, dower or damage to private property, and how much money has been expended for attorneys' fees in settling rights of way; the names of the attorneys and the names and salaries of all men employed as superintendents upon the said improvements.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that he modify his resolution so as to ascertain the amount expended by the Government of the United States. This Fox River canal is a very old affair, and a great deal of money was expended before the Government took charge of it. Perhaps the Secretary of War would not be able to furnish an accurate account of it.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I presume that is the meaning of the resolution. It does not ask the Secretary of War for information except such as he is able specifically to give. I have no objection to the insertion of the words necessary to make clear that idea.

Mr. ALLISON. I think that would make it more specific.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be so modified.

Mr. HOWE. I think the amendment suggested by the Senator from Iowa is very proper, to relieve the Secretary of War from all doubt upon the point, though I should put the construction upon it which the Senator from Ohio does. I think it very proper that the Senate should have whatever information there is in the possession of the War Office on this point.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I was unfortunate enough not to hear the resolution. If I understand it, it is a resolution calling for information only from the Secretary.

Mr. MATTHEWS. That is all.

The resolution was agreed to.

TERRITORIAL MILITARY TELEGRAPH.

Mr. ANTHONY. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first case on the Calendar at the point where it is now to be considered is the bill (S. No. 864) to provide for the construction, maintenance, and operation of a military telegraph in Dakota and Montana Territories.

Mr. McMILLAN. The chairman of the committee reporting the bill is absent, and I ask that it go over.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator will not object to that bill. There is a report which explains the whole matter, and it is considered by the Army a matter of material interest, and there are other members of the committee present as familiar with it as the chairman.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think the bill had better go over this morning. I should like to look into it further.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota objects, and the bill will be passed over.

MISSOURI WAR CLAIMS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 893) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to examine the evidence of payments made by the State of Missouri since April 17, 1866, to the officers and privates of the militia forces of said State for military services actually performed in the suppression of the rebellion, in full concert and co-operation with the authorities of the United States, and subject to their orders, and to make report thereof to Congress; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OSAGE COUNSEL FEES.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 582) providing for the payment of counsel fees in Osage ceded land suits.

Mr. SARGENT. I object to that. It is too important to be considered under the five-minute rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

WILLIAM S. DAVIS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1780) granting a pension to William S. Davis, late private in Company E, Thirty-first Illinois Infantry Volunteers; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Is there a written report in that case?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to hear the facts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. BRUCE on the 10th instant:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1780) granting a pension to William S. Davis, late private Company E, Thirty-first Illinois Volunteers, submit the following report:

The evidence submitted in this case shows that petitioner was a member of Company E, Thirty-first Illinois Volunteer Infantry, for one hundred days from October 15, 1864, and that while on a forced march from Marietta to Savannah, Georgia, in November, 1864, he received a gunshot wound in the left hand, which resulted in the total loss of the use of said hand. It further appears from the evidence that claimant, while in the hospital on account of his said wound, suffered from various relapses on his leg caused by hard marching, and was treated for this disease also while in said hospital.

It appears that when Davis was discharged, thinking the affection of his legs would be temporary, he did not apply for pension except on the ground of disability of his hand; but subsequently the affection of the leg grew much worse and became permanently disabling, until about three years since, when he became satisfied of the hopelessness of recovery and applied for a pension on the ground of paris.

Pension was allowed claimant for the disability of his hand, (see certificate 110-17,) but the claim for increase of pension on account of paris was rejected by the Commissioner of Pensions, because it was alleged that said increase "was barred under the provisions of section 4717." It is evident that claimant was a healthy man when he entered the service and that he left the service with his health permanently destroyed. It is further in evidence that he was a brave and faithful soldier and is deprived of the increase prayed for in his petition, not for lack of merit in the claim, but merely a technical point growing out of an innocent and unavoidable delay in filing his claim before the Department.

The circumstances considered, the committee recommend the passage of the House bill No. 1780.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DOUGHTY & CARD.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 1066) for the relief of Doughty & Card; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for paying to Doughty & Card, attorneys, of Lake City, Minnesota, $115.32, in full satisfaction of the fees and expenses of Hiram Powers, constable; W. J. Jacobs, justice of the peace, and the witnesses, and their own fees and charges, in and about the taking of depositions for the United States in the case of Parish & Co. vs. The United States, in the Court of Claims.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS M. SIMMONS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 1067) for the relief of Thomas M. Simmons; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for paying to Thomas M. Simmons $5,904.83, in full payment for the use and occupation of the premises known as the Alabama press yard No. 2 and the Crescent City press in New Orleans, in the years 1863, 1864, and 1865, by the United States troops, and in full satisfaction of any and all liability of the Government for rent, use, occupation, or damages.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

T. B. KELLY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 1068) for the relief of T. B. Kelly; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Second Lieutenant T. B. Kelly, late an officer in the Signal Corps, for services rendered by him from April 4, 1863, to September 15, 1864, during which period he was paid only the pay of a private soldier while performing the duties of an officer and supporting himself.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TRANSPORTATION OF IMPORTED MERCHANDISE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 576) to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of imported merchandise.

The bill was read.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That appears to be a very important bill. It makes sundry changes in the Revised Statutes and confers additional privileges upon the Secretary of the Treasury; and it occurs to me that, without some explanation of the necessity of it or something from the Treasury Department showing the necessity, it ought not to pass. However, I will listen to the Senator who reported the bill if he wishes to say anything.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. President, this bill involves the amendment to a slight degree of several sections of the Revised Statutes. In the sections referred to the term "vehicle" is used as a means of transportation, and merchandise is to be transported in a sealed car. This bill provides for the transportation of small packages of merchandise in trunks and in the original packages, to be sealed and to be transported under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall direct.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. May I ask the Senator, to save time, whether there is a recommendation from the Secretary of the Treasury asking for this additional legislation?

Mr. McMILLAN. There is not. The matter was submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, and a part of the bill does not meet with his approbation; and I called the attention of the Senate to the fact that such a communication had been received when I made the report. The communication of the Secretary of the Treasury is with the bill, and may be read.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think it is almost too important a bill to be discussed under the five-minute rule. I think it had better go over.

Mr. McMILLAN. The only reason why this matter should not go over is that it is desirable, if the bill is to pass, that it should pass early, in order to enable the companies having charge of the transportation of goods to make their arrangements for transporting the goods which shall come to this country from the Paris exposition. The bill provides for the transportation of merchandise in trunks and in packages sealed, instead of sealed cars, to inland ports of appraisal, and they are there to be appraised; and it seems to the committee that this method of transportation will secure the payment of import duties to a large extent that otherwise the Government would be defrauded of.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. While of course I ought to listen to the Senator if he desires to make any remarks, this is a bill which I learn from the Senator that the Secretary of the Treasury does not approve. It is certainly very important when we come to alter the revenue laws in sundry parts of the Revised Statutes that the matter be considered very carefully. In my judgment it ought to meet the approbation of those who have the duties to perform, the Secretary of the Treasury and the collector at the port of New York, for instance, but especially the Secretary, as he is the responsible man. It ought to meet his approval fully, or it ought not to pass. Neither the Senator from Minnesota nor myself knows anything about the effect of the bill upon the collection of the revenue, and I think it ought to go over.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator from West Virginia will allow me to say that I suppose the policy of the Treasury Department is to prevent the transportation of merchandise to any of the inland ports without an appraisal at the original port of entry. We have our inland ports of appraisal established, and if goods are transported without any change they can go to those inland ports and be appraised and delivered to their consignee, or the person who is to receive the goods, with much less delay than is now occasioned; and this transportation is to be under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, according to such regulations as he may prescribe. It will only enable the recipients of freight at these inland ports to receive their goods at a much earlier day than they otherwise would; and it seems to me that there would be no inducement to defraud the revenue under those circumstances, there being no delay at the ocean ports, but the goods would be transported immediately, and those who would receive them would not object to the payment of duties.

Mr. PADDOCK. Is it not true also that all importers in the rural districts of the country are often subjected to annoying expenses on the part of those who have to do with putting through their goods?

Mr. McMILLAN. That is a frequent cause of complaint. If the Senator from West Virginia has no objection to it, I hope we shall act on the bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I cannot consent to the bill being acted on now.

Mr. McMILLAN. Perhaps the communication from the Secretary of the Treasury had better be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from West Virginia object?

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask that the communication from the Secretary be read.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I have no objection to that; but as at present advised, I shall object to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication is not here; and the bill will be laid aside temporarily.

PIER-LIGHTS AT MISSISSIPPI JETTIES.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1639) making an appropriation for pier-lights at the entrance of the jetties in the South Pass of the Mississippi River; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It appropriates $10,000 for the erection and maintenance of pier-lights, under the direction of the Light-House Board, at the entrance of the jetties in the South Pass of the Mississippi River.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SETTLERS ON PUBLIC LANDS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 1071) for the relief of settlers on the public lands.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to have this laid aside temporarily. I desire to look at it. I do not object to the principle.

DISTRICT CHURCH PROPERTY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3690) to relieve the churches of the District of Columbia and to clear the title of the trustees to such property.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments, in line 7, after the word "exemptions," to insert "from taxation;" and in line 8, after the word "property," to insert "which was actually held and used for the purpose of divine worship;" and in line 9, to strike out the words "from taxation;" so as to read:

That so much of an act of Congress entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1874, as was construed to authorize the commissioners of the District to set aside former exemptions from taxation of church property which was actually held and used for the purpose of divine worship, and to enforce a tax upon such property, be, and is hereby, repealed; and the title to such property is hereby declared to vest in the trustees, or such other persons as held the title to the same at the time of the passage of the act of 1874, or their successors in interest, notwithstanding the sale of such property for non-payment of taxes.

The next amendment was, to insert as section 2:

SEC. 2. That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they hereby are, authorized and required to refund to the trustees or other proper officers of such church or churches as have paid the taxes assessed against them under the act of June 20, 1874, such sums respectively as were paid by each upon property actually held and used for the purpose of divine worship.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear that explained. Is there any report? If there is, I should like to hear the report.

Mr. HARRIS. There is a report which can be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. HARRIS on the 15th instant:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3690) to relieve the churches of the District of Columbia and to clear the title of the trustees to such property, has had the same under consideration, and report:

That by referring to a letter addressed to your committee by the commissioners of the District of Columbia, it will be seen that under act of June 20, 1874, the church property within the District was valued at $1,590,744 and that the taxes assessed upon the church property in the city of Washington amounted to $42,773.82; in Georgetown, to $2,891.37; in the county of Washington, to $985.90, making an aggregate of $46,651.09; of which amount $2,566.68 has been collected, leaving $44,084.41, with accrued penalty of $3,360.82, making an aggregate of $47,445.23 of unpaid taxes.

The property was advertised in June, 1875, at a cost to the District of $744.15, which, added to unpaid taxes, makes $48,189.38 as the aggregate charges against said property, at which price the District of Columbia became the purchaser at the tax sale, and now holds said property subject to redemption by the payment of said sum with interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum from 29th of June, 1875, the date of sale.

The bill under consideration repeals so much of the act of 20th June, 1874, as authorized the levy of this tax, and relinquishes the title acquired under the tax sale and reverts the same in the trustees of the several churches.

The committee report the bill back with an amendment, confining its operations to property actually held and used for the purpose of public worship.

Seriously doubting, as the committee does, the wisdom of the policy of taxing property held and used for the purpose of public worship, the committee recommends that the title to all such property be restored to the various churches and that the sum of $2,566.68, heretofore collected under the said assessment by the commissioners of the District, be refunded to the trustees of the churches which paid the same, as it would be unjust to retain the funds so collected when the churches that failed to pay are released from liability.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the bill read again to show that part of it which provides for the refunding.

The Chief Clerk read the bill as proposed to be amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That involves a very broad question. After considerable discussion, as I remember, it was decided that, in the condition the District was, church property ought to pay taxes as well as other property, and accordingly the law provided for its taxation, and it was taxed. Sundry churches paid, as other citizens did, their taxes; others did not. Now, it is proposed to undo all that, and instead of requiring the churches that have not paid to pay or lose their property, to redeem the sales, to repay out of the funds of the District that which has been paid and to transfer the property that has been bought off at tax sales to the various boards of trustees that were the owners of it, by which the revenues of the District are to be diminished to the extent of about $50,000, if I correctly noticed the sum.

Well, Mr. President, we have just shut up, or are about to shut up on Wednesday next, the public schools of the District because there is not fund enough derived from taxation to teach the youth of the District and to pay the teachers. Now it is a very serious question in my mind whether it would not be better to allow these delinquent churches, who set their faces against the law contrary to the Scripture, to pay up; whether the policy of church taxation is wise or not, to teach them obedience to law; and then let them go in the future, as I believe the law has been changed—but I am not sure about it—and let this money which would keep the schools running for the next two months be devoted, as it might be, out of the general funds of the District to teaching the youth. It is one part of Christianity, real Christianity, to teach the young. It does more for morals and religion probably than any other thing that can be done, and I am not altogether favorably impressed with the idea of recognizing the defiance of law which some of the owners of church property in the District have assumed to set up, while others have paid, and then after two or three years, after their property is sold and when it becomes necessary either to pay or lose the property, to then repeal the law and pay the money back. It is a bad principle of legislation. It encourages all people who do not wish to pay taxes to set up their faces against what the law plainly was, because, so far as I have heard, there does not appear to have been any dispute about the fact that they were taxable by law and that the taxation was regular upon their real estate. The money was due. Some paid; others refused, and their property was sold. Now the time is coming very near when they must either redeem this property or they will lose the title to it; and the money that they would have paid might have been devoted to the uses of education which come out of the general fund into which this goes, and these schools could have been kept up. I suppose when the estimates were made from time to time by the District government in order to carry on all branches of its operations, the available funds included these taxes against church property, because the law was plain and the taxation being upon real estate, there could be very little dispute about what it amounted to or the regularity of the proceedings; and on such estimates the commissioners of the District proceeded to arrange for their schools for the year and keep up their other operations of repairing the streets and carrying on the water operations and sanitary operations and all things of that sort. Now when we come to the actual realization of the money, the very organizations that will set up for the purpose of teaching us obedience to law set the law at defiance and decline to pay, allow the property to be sold, while some others, greatly to their credit I think, do pay. Now we are to come in at the end and crucify the schools in order to relieve the church property. I am not in favor of it, Mr. President, as at present advised, and I object to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The bill being objected to goes over.

Mr. HARRIS. Do I understand the Senator from Vermont to object to the consideration of the bill, or merely to object to the passage of the bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object to the consideration. I want an hour or two to speak on that subject. I shall withdraw the objection to allow my friend to make an explanation.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not care about speaking if the bill cannot be considered.

SETTLERS ON PUBLIC LANDS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate returns to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1071) for the relief of settlers on the public lands.

Mr. SARGENT. I have withdrawn my objection to that bill.

There being no further objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 1071) for the relief of settlers on the public lands. It provides that where any settler upon the public lands shall have paid, under the pre-emption laws, double-minimum price for the land purchased by him, because such land was at the time within the double-minimum limits of a railroad grant, but which land was afterward thrown outside of the double-minimum limits of the grant by reason of a change in the route of the road recognized by the General Land Office in the adjustment of the grant, such settler, or, in case of his death, his widow or children, if he or they own the land at the time of his or their application for repayment, shall be entitled to repayment of the difference between the price paid and the minimum price of the land, on condition that the land would, if vacant at the time the application for repayment is made, be subject to sale or entry at the minimum rate of $1.25 per acre. It also provides that where any settler shall have made entry, under the homestead laws, of eighty acres of double-minimum lands within the limits of a railroad grant, and which land shall, in the manner before set forth, have been thrown outside of the double-minimum limits of the grant, such settler, or, in case of his death, his widow, or, in case of her death, their minor children, shall, if residing upon and occupying the land at the time he, she, or they shall apply therefor, be permitted to enter under the homestead laws an additional eighty acres adjoining the land embraced in his entry, if such additional land be subject to entry; or if he, she, or they so elect, may surrender his entry to the United States for cancellation, and thereupon be entitled to enter lands under the homestead laws, the same as if the surrendered entry had not been made. Any person so making additional entry of eighty acres, or new entry after the surrender and cancellation of his original entry, shall be permitted so to do without payment of fees and commissions, and the residence and cultivation of such person upon and of the land embraced in his original entry shall be considered residence and cultivation for the same length of time upon and of the land embraced in his additional or new entry, and shall be deducted from the five years' residence and cultivation required by law.

The bill was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let that bill, as it is short, be read a third time at length.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

SILAS M. NORTON.

The bill (H. R. No. 3859) for the relief of Silas M. Norton, postmaster at Bristol, Connecticut, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for crediting Silas M. Norton with $187.70 in his account as postmaster at Bristol, Connecticut, being the amount of money-orders paid by him and destroyed by fire when his office was burned, April 13, 1873.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there a report in that case?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. BURN-SIDE on the 15th instant:

The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3859) for the relief of Silas M. Norton, postmaster at Bristol, Connecticut, have to report:

That Silas M. Norton, postmaster at Bristol, Connecticut, represents that the block in which was located the post-office at Bristol was destroyed by fire on the 13th of April, 1873. The fire originated in a store adjoining the post-office, and when first discovered had gained such headway that it was impossible to save anything from the post-office or other portions of the block. That among the property destroyed were money-orders amounting to the sum of $378.53. Of this amount he has obtained receipts from persons to whom the money was paid amounting to $392.83, which receipts have been received by the Post-Office Department in settlement of that proportion of his loss, leaving a balance due from him to the Government of $187.70, for which he asks an appropriation. The correctness of his statement is vouched for and the amount called for verified (as the amount for which vouchers could not be returned) by J. J. Martin, Auditor of the Post-Office Department, under date of June 6, 1874. Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT JUSTICES AND CONSTABLES.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3969) regulating the appointment of justices of the peace, commissioners of deeds, and constables within and for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was read.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask to have read again the clause early in the bill providing for the appointment of justices of the peace.

Mr. INGALLS. I suggest before it is read that the committee have recommended an amendment to that clause of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia will be stated in their order.

The Chief Clerk read the first amendment, which was, in line 3 of section 1, to strike out "commissioners of the District of Columbia" and insert "President of the United States;" after the word "shall," in line 4, to insert "nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate;" after the word "appoint," in line 5, to strike out

"five" and insert "fifteen;" and in lines 6 and 7 to strike out "for said District" and insert "within and for the District of Columbia;" so as to read:

That the President of the United States shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint fifteen justices of the peace and not exceeding twenty constables within and for the District of Columbia.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas, who reported this bill, whether this bill does not propose really to legislate out of office the present incumbents of the office of justice of the peace, and whether that is the object and purpose of the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. The object and purpose of the bill, I should say in response to the Senator from Delaware, is to reform the judicial system of the District so far as it relates to justices of the peace, and to secure an efficient administration of justice. It will undoubtedly have the effect of displacing those who are already in office. There are fifty justices of the peace at the present time, and complaint is very general that the condition of affairs in regard to small suits is exceedingly unsatisfactory. The bill reported from the committee in the House provided for five justices instead of the fifty that now exercise that power. The committee of the Senate thought that number was too small, considering that the population of the District is somewhere about one hundred and thirty or one hundred and forty thousand, and have increased the number to fifteen and provided for their distribution in the different parts of the District according to population. There being several suburban regions where there are independent communities, it was thought best to assign a magistrate to them as well as to the city of Washington.

Mr. SAULSBURY. There is no written explanation of the bill. I understand it provides for justices making transcripts of their dockets for litigants, or persons who have business on the dockets. I would suggest to the Senator from Kansas if it would not be better to require them to deliver over their records without subjecting parties who have business on their dockets to the expense of paying for transcripts that they may require.

Mr. INGALLS. The provision to which the Senator from Delaware refers occurs in the bill as presented from the House. The committee of the Senate amended it to provide that the dockets and papers of the retiring magistrates shall be deposited in the office of the clerk of the supreme court of the District, who shall, upon the demand of parties in interest, deliver transcripts properly certified. The difficulty in providing for the delivery of these dockets to the successors of those who are now in office was this: there are at present fifty justices; the new bill provides for but fifteen; and therefore it would be impossible to provide for the delivery to the successors by those who are now in office, the number being much smaller. The bill as presented from the House provided that the outgoing magistrates should retain possession of their own dockets and issue process upon the demand of persons interested. The committee thought that, inasmuch as those persons would not have any special interest in the custody of those dockets, it was advisable to provide some place where they could be securely retained and from which process could be issued in furtherance of proceedings already instituted. The subject is one of considerable importance and also of considerable difficulty, and the committee endeavored as far as possible to guard against the evils that have for a long time been a subject of complaint in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator who reported the bill whether it is worth while to impose upon the President of the United States and the Senate the duty of selecting constables for this District? This office is ordinarily filled by municipal authority, the selectmen of towns or other similar authorities in our part of the country. It struck me on reading the amendment that if it be adopted it will become the duty of the Senate to pass upon the fitness of every one of the twenty constables when he is originally nominated, and to pass upon all charges under the theory of the duty of the Senate in relation to such matters which is espoused by the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee, if I understand him—

Mr. EDMUNDS. And several others.

Mr. HOAR. And many other members of the Senate. It will become the duty of the Senate to inquire into every charge which is made against a constable in office on which the President proposes to make a removal.

Mr. INGALLS. The suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts is pertinent and one that occurred to the committee when they had this bill under consideration; but my understanding is that the Constitution imposes this duty upon the President, that it is not the act of the committee, and that the joint action of the two Houses cannot remove that duty from him. The Constitution provides that the President shall have power to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint officers of the United States. The committee believed that justices of the peace and constables in this District are officers of the United States, inasmuch as the Constitution has imposed upon Congress the duty of exclusive legislation for the District. The Constitution declares that the appointment of inferior officers may by law be confided either to the President alone or to the head of a Department. There was a difference of opinion in the committee as to whether this duty ought not to be imposed upon the President alone, as the Constitution plainly gives the power; but the opinion of the majority seemed to be that inasmuch as the duties of these magistrates were of very considerable importance, and as they ought to be exercised by men of influence and discretion and learning and judgment, that it would be well to dignify them by making them a presidential appointment, with the advice and consent of the Senate. If the Senator will observe the provision of the Constitution, I think he will agree with the committee that it is not in the power of Congress to remove the appointment from the President and deposit it anywhere else.

Mr. HOAR. My inquiry related to the office of constable, not to the magistrates mentioned in the section. It seems to me that it would be more expedient either to give the power to the President alone or to the Department of the Interior, or some one of the heads of Departments.

Mr. INGALLS. It was my judgment that the power ought to be given to the President alone, but I was overslaughed in committee, and of course reported the bill under instructions. I am inclined to think myself that it is not necessary to require the advice and consent of the Senate in these matters; but inasmuch as the committee thought otherwise I discharge a duty in reporting the bill.

Mr. HOAR. I will venture to test the sense of the Senate by moving to amend by substituting the supreme court of the District of Columbia as the authority to appoint the constables in the District instead of the President and Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will send his amendment to the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out in line 6 the words, "and not exceeding twenty constables."

Mr. INGALLS. Stop there; and leave them to be provided for subsequently.

Mr. HOAR. I will move the amendment in that way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the amendment be read as it now stands.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That the President of the United States shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint fifteen justices of the peace within and for the District of Columbia.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The constables are stricken out. Who is to appoint them?

Mr. INGALLS. That is to be subsequently provided for on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If I correctly understand the Senator from Massachusetts, his principal point was the question of removal in respect of inquiring into charges that might be made against these people within their terms. The bill now, if I correctly understand it, provides that they may be removed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Am I right about that?

Mr. INGALLS. The bill now provides that these removals upon charges shall be by the supreme court of the District.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I have nothing to say because I think that is the proper tribunal to inquire whether these people, justices of the peace or constables, are misbehaving themselves, and to provide for their being expelled from office. I suppose no gentleman will doubt the constitutionality of that. The President is to appoint either alone or by and with the advice and consent of the Senate for a given term. That is one thing. Then to expel the person from office for misconduct is quite a different thing, which may be vested by law in any tribunal of proper inquiry that Congress, which fixes the tenure, may designate.

Mr. INGALLS. Section 4 does that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That being done by section 4, it is exactly in accordance with what I think is a correct principle.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee as amended in the first section down to line 7.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia was after the words "District of Columbia," in line 7 of section 1, to insert:

Said justices of the peace shall be assigned as follows: two in the city of Georgetown, one in Tennallytown, one in Brightwood, one in Uniontown, and ten in the city of Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 11 of section 1, to strike out "two" and insert "four;" so as to read:

Their term of office shall be four years, subject to removal for cause.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, to strike out, commencing in line 5, the words:

Have power thereafter to make and deliver transcripts of unfinished cases and business on their docket, and—

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Deposit their docket, books, papers, and records pertaining to their office in the office of the clerk of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, who,

So as to read:

They shall issue no process returnable on or after that day, and shall deposit their docket, books, papers, and records pertaining to their office in the office of the clerk of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, who shall, on demand of the parties in interest, deliver to them transcripts, duly certified, together with all papers left or filed with them by said parties in said case or proceeding.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I inquire of the Senator in charge of the bill, under this section what will become of cases pending before the present justices on that day, returnable before that time, but not disposed of? The second section provides that they shall issue no process returnable after that day. Suppose they issue process returnable on the day before and the case thus brought before them is not disposed of, is there another provision of the bill for finishing up unfinished business?

Mr. INGALLS. The bill provides in the same section which declares when their terms of office shall expire.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But I see it imposes the duty of closing up pending cases on the new officers.

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know but that that will do.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "proceeding," in lines 12 and 13 of section 2, to strike out "and pay to the proper persons all moneys in their hands that may be due them."

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the meaning of striking that out?

Mr. INGALLS. Simply because we have provided for the transfer of these dockets and papers to the clerk of the supreme court of the District that clause is without meaning.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, to strike out, in line 1, "commissioners of said District" and insert "supreme court of the District of Columbia;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. The supreme court of the District of Columbia shall have the power to fix the amount and form of the bail-bonds, and approve the same, to be given by said justices of the peace and constables, and make such further regulations as may be necessary to complete the transfer of the existing business from the present justices of the peace to those appointed under this act, and for the return of any writ, execution, or other process by the present justices of the peace to those appointed under this act, and may remove justices of the peace and constables from office for willful violation of law, or for gross misconduct, or for gross incompetency.

Mr. HOAR. I would inquire of the Senator from Kansas if the word "bail-bonds" is not a misprint. Ought it not to be "bonds" simply.

Mr. INGALLS. It is as the bill came from the House. I never paid special attention to that phrase.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a technical phrase really which does not apply to a justice of the peace or a constable.

Mr. INGALLS. I think the word "bail" and the hyphen should be stricken out. I make that suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be made if there be no objection; and the question is on the amendment of the committee as thus amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 5, line 1, after the word "the," to strike out the words "commissioners of the District of Columbia" and insert "President of the United States;" in line 2, before the word "hereby," to strike out "are" and insert "is;" in line 4, after the word "as," to strike out "they" and insert "he;" in line 10, before the word "shall," to strike out "they" and insert "the President;" and in line 12, before the word "discretion," to strike out "their" and insert "his;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. The President of the United States is hereby authorized to appoint as many commissioners of deeds throughout the United States as he may deem necessary, with powers to take the acknowledgment of deeds for the conveyance of property within the said District, administer oaths, and take depositions in cases pending in the courts of said District in the manner prescribed by law; to whose acts, properly attested by their hands and seals of office, full faith and credit shall be given. The President shall also have power to appoint such number of notaries public, residents of said District, as in his discretion the business of the District may require; said commissioners of deeds and notaries public to hold their offices for the period of five years, removable at discretion. All notaries public shall pay into the treasury of the District an annual license of $5.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to call the attention of my honorable friend from Kansas to the provision about commissioners of deeds, whether it may not be advisable to limit the number? If you have the number unlimited, it may be said, and I think there is some force in the suggestion, that every person applying almost would be appointed, and it would run down into getting improper persons; whereas, if you limit the number to a sufficiency, so that the fees to each one would amount to something, you would be likely to get persons of more responsibility and character. No doubt the committee has considered it.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator will observe that these officers are officers of the District resident in other States. They are not officers resident here. Consequently a restriction as to number appeared to be unnecessary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I observed that, but the same principle would apply to commissioners of deeds here. Take the State of Vermont or Kansas, for instance; if the President may appoint thirty people in those two States, when there are not more than twenty-five deeds in a year to be acknowledged, if he had an unlimited scope, everybody who applied, who had proper recommendations no doubt would be appointed, as I think the practice is now. Would it not be advisable to limit the number to each State, not exceeding so many? I merely make the suggestion for the consideration of the committee.

Mr. INGALLS. I am inclined to think, inasmuch as these officers are required to provide seals of office and books of record, that there is hardly any danger to be apprehended that more would apply for the office than could properly discharge the duty; but, if the Senator from Vermont wishes to make any suggestion, I have no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely call the attention of the Senator to it. The next amendment was to strike out section 6, in the following words:

SEC. 6. For each official certificate by the secretary of the commissioners of the District, the party for whom the same shall be made shall pay the sum of $1 to the account of the contingent fund of said District.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. It has been suggested to me by several parties in the District who are familiar with business affairs here that it would be unjust to impose the license fee of $5 annually, provided for in section 5, upon notaries public in the District, making them an exception, and I will move to strike out that clause after the word "discretion" in line 15 to the end of the section, in the following words:

All notaries public shall pay into the treasury of the District an annual license of $5.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Would it not be better, instead of striking that out, to add the justices of the peace if they have the same power, so as to make them pay in the $5 to help up the school fund a little?

Mr. INGALLS. I have no objection. It seemed to me to be rather an invidious discrimination. As notaries are officers of great public convenience and frequently discharge their duties as a matter of accommodation, it seemed to be unnecessary to impose a burden upon them; but if the Senate thinks otherwise I have no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is only a question all around of raising revenue upon the business done in the District to carry on its operations, and so far as justices of the peace and notaries public do not a judicial business, (where they are bound and called upon to decide questions as justices are, and not notaries,) a business for profit, of course like every other business done for profit, if you have a license system it is a question whether they ought not to be in. This would apply to justices so far as their business is of a notarial character, if they charge compensation as conveyancers and scriveners, and so on. But very likely the Senator is right; there seems to be a general disposition to diminish the resources of the District as far as possible.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I move to amend the first section by inserting in the thirty-first line, after the word "office," the words:

The supreme court of the District shall have authority to appoint not exceeding twenty constables, who shall hold office for four years, subject to be removed by said court for cause upon hearing.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there an amendment made in line 6 of section 1 striking out the number of constables where it there occurs?

Mr. INGALLS. There is not. We do not change the number of constables.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How does it now read in the fifth and sixth lines?

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That the President of the United States shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint fifteen justices of the peace within and for the District of Columbia.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That makes no provision there for the appointment of constables. Then it goes on and speaks of justices of the peace and "said officers respectively." The word "respectively" in line 14 would probably need to be out, though perhaps not. It might apply to the justices as well as constables, not then in the opening part of the section; and it provides for the succeeding justices taking up the unfinished business of the old ones. Now in line 31 it reads—

And said constables shall be the successors of the constables now holding office in the said District.

Is that still in the bill?

Mr. HOAR. An amendment has been inserted before that.

Mr. INGALLS. It is properly in the bill? The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts precedes it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear it with the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Upon the death or removal of any justice of the peace appointed under this act, his docket, books, and papers of office shall be delivered to his immediate successor in office. The supreme court of the District shall have authority to appoint not exceeding twenty constables, who shall hold office for four years, subject to be removed by said court for cause upon hearing. And said constables shall be the successors of the constables now holding office in said District.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That raises a question which I wish to propose to my honorable friend from Kansas as to what is to become of process in the hands of a constable who goes out of office. Does the bill make any provision for that? Suppose he has an execution unlevied or a mesne process unexecuted, does that fall?

Mr. INGALLS. The proviso of section 3 is "that they may duly execute and return all writs and processes in their hands at the time of the expiration of their term of office."

Mr. EDMUNDS. That only refers to the present constables.

Mr. INGALLS. Those who retire under this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; but I am inquiring in respect to those who are to be appointed and who are to have succession under the first section of the bill. Suppose a vacancy occurs on the removal of one of these, is there any provision as to his disposing of the process?

Mr. INGALLS. I think there is not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The question is whether it would not be wise to provide in the third section for either having the successor take all constable's duties, or having, as the usual course is with sheriffs and constables, the outgoing executive officer, as distinguished from a judicial one, finish up the business in his hands. I think it is the law of most of the States that if a sheriff's term of office expires and an unexecuted writ in his hands is still to be executed, whether it is mesne or final process, he and his sureties are liable for the due execution of it just as if his term had not expired.

Mr. INGALLS. Does not the proviso of section 3 cover that case?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think not for the reason that it says "they," that is the constables now in office, "may duly execute and return all writs and processes in their hands at the time of the expiration of their term of office." That section is adapted entirely to the present constables who are by this bill to be removed from office by an abolition of their term, so that it would seem to make no provision for a change in the office of constable, on expiration of a term, or a removal of one appointed under this act.

Mr. INGALLS. If the language should be so changed as to say that "all constables may execute all writs and processes in their hands," &c., would not that cover it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That would do it.

Mr. INGALLS. I would then suggest that the word "they" be stricken out after the word "however" in line 6 of section 3, and "all constables" inserted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Strike out the words "provided however" and make a period there, and it will make it clear.

Mr. INGALLS. I will put the amendment in that form, and move it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think that will do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest that the amendment just inserted in the first section to the last clause of the original text be transferred to the beginning of the third section.

Mr. INGALLS. I can see no objection to that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That will bring the constables all together.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That transposition will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the word "gross" in line 12 of section 4 before "incompetency" be stricken out. If the officer is incompetent for his duties, it seems hardly worth while to impose on the court that has authority to remove him the question of inquiring into the degree of incompetency.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Strike out the "gross" in both places.

Mr. HOAR. In both places on the twelfth line of section 4 where it comes before the word "misconduct" and before "incompetency."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to strike out also the word "respectively" at the end of line 13 of section one.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

REPEAL OF RESUMPTION ACT.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 1085) to repeal all that part of the act approved January 14, 1875, known as the resumption act, which authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of United States bonds and redeem and cancel the greenback currency.

Mr. MORRILL and Mr. HOAR. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is objected to, and will go over.

MONUMENT TO THOMAS JEFFERSON.

The next business on the Calendar was the joint resolution (H. R. No. 158) for the erection of a monument over the grave of Thomas Jefferson.

Mr. MORRILL. I think it would be proper to refer that resolution to some committee, perhaps the Committee on the Library.

Mr. HOWE. That resolution was reported from the Joint Committee on the Library to the House of Representatives, and passed there, and for that reason it was not referred in the Senate. The resolution as reported to the House recommended the appropriation of $2,500, but in the House the appropriation was raised to $5,000. It was thought upon information they had there, which was not communicated to me, that $5,000 was probably as small a sum as would answer the purpose; but as the money is to be expended by the Secretary of State, it was assumed that there was no risk in appropriating the $5,000; if it is not all necessary, it will not all be used.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution; which provides for expending under the direction of the Secretary of State $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the erection of a suitable monument over the grave of Thomas Jefferson, at Monticello. The owners of the estate upon which the grave is situated are first to quitclaim to the United States all right of property to two rods square of the land surrounding and including the grave, and grant to the public the free right of access thereto.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMOS B. FERGUSON.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 27) for the relief of Amos B. Ferguson; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Amos B. Ferguson, late second lieutenant Eightieth New York Infantry Volunteers, (called also Twentieth New York State Militia,) of a sum that shall be equal to the pay of a second lieutenant of infantry of the United States Army in active service, from the 23d of April, 1864, to the 26th of September, 1864, deducting therefrom any amount that he may have received as the pay of a non-commissioned officer or private for the same period of time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. PLUMB on the 16th instant:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 27) for the relief of Amos B. Ferguson, having had the same under consideration, submit the following report:

A bill substantially the same as the one under consideration passed the Senate during the closing days of the last session of Congress, (S. No. 27 of that session,) but was not acted upon by the House. It was also favorably considered and reported upon by the Senate Committee on Military Affairs of the Forty-third Congress (report No. 559, accompanying S. No. 765.)

The case, therefore, having once been favorably considered by the Senate, the committee adopt the views embraced in the report above referred to which is hereto appended, and recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Report of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate on bill for the relief of Amos B. Ferguson (S. No. 765,) submitted January 26, 1875:

The record in this case shows that the petitioner was promoted from the rank of sergeant to second lieutenant Eightieth New York Infantry, to date from April 26, 1864, and served as such officer with all the duties and responsibilities thereof from said date. Owing to some negligence on the part of the officers of the State government of New York, his commission was not received until September 26, 1864, at City Point, Virginia, and this bill provides for his payment as such second lieutenant, less any amount paid him as sergeant from April 20 to September 26, 1864.

As this officer was not supernumerary and the fault of non-muster as second lieutenant was not attributable to him, together with the fact that he performed duty as such second lieutenant, the committee recommend passage of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Was the preceding second lieutenant paid down to the same time or later?

Mr. PLUMB. No, sir. The rule the committee has adopted is to recommend no allowance where the officer was a supernumerary. The allowance is only in cases where he was not a supernumerary, and did the duty of a rank which he ought to have been mustered for, but on account of some obstacle which he could not overcome was not able to muster.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And for which no payment has been made to anybody else?

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MINNESOTA SALT-SPRING LANDS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 1073) granting lands to the State of Minnesota in lieu of certain lands heretofore granted to said State; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to grant to the State of Minnesota, to be selected by the governor, twenty-four sections of land, out of any public lands of the United States not otherwise appropriated, in lieu and instead of twenty-four sections of the land granted to the State by the fourth subdivision of section 5 of an act entitled "An act to authorize the people of the Territory of Minnesota to form a constitution and State government preparatory to their admission in the Union on an equal footing with the original States," approved February 26, 1857, and selected by the State, but which were subsequently otherwise disposed of by the United States, and to which the United States cannot make title to the State.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, to add the following proviso:

Provided, That the lands herein granted shall be selected within three years, and from unoccupied lands of the United States lying within the State of Minnesota.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the report.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. JONES, of Florida, on the 16th instant:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the memorial of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, approved February 26, 1877, asking the passage of a law by Congress "granting to the State of Minnesota other lands within said State in lieu of lands of said State designated and known as 'salt-spring lands,' in which and to which there are any adverse claims by pre-emption filings, homestead, cash, or scrip entries," have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

By the provisions of "An act to authorize the people of the Territory of Minnesota to form a constitution and State government preparatory to their admission in the Union on an equal footing with the original States," approved February 26, 1857, the boundaries of such future State are defined, &c., and section 5 of said act reads as follows:

"Be it enacted, That the following propositions be, and the same are hereby, offered to the said convention of the people of Minnesota for their free use, acceptance, or rejection, which, if accepted by the convention, shall be obligatory on the United States and upon the said State of Minnesota, to wit:—

The fourth subdivision of said section reads as follows:

"Fourth. That all salt springs within said State, not exceeding twelve in number, with six sections of land adjoining or as contiguous as may be to each, shall be granted to said State for its use; the same to be selected by the governor thereof within one year after the admission of said State, and when so selected to be used or disposed of on such terms, conditions, and regulations as the Legislature shall direct. Provided, That no salt spring or land, the right whereof is now vested in any individual or individuals, or which may be hereafter confirmed or adjudged to any individual or individuals, shall by this article be granted to said State."—United States Statutes at Large, volume 11, pages 166, 167.

On the 29th of August, 1857, the people of said Territory did, by delegates elected for that purpose, form for themselves a constitution and State government, which is republican in form, and was ratified and adopted by the people at an election held on the 13th October, 1857, for that purpose, and by an act of Congress approved May 11, 1858, entitled "An act for the admission of the State of Minnesota into the Union," said State was declared to be one of the United States of America "and admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever." (United States Statutes, volume 11, page 255.) From evidence submitted with said memorial in the printed reports of the auditor of said State of Minnesota, and from copies of correspondence between said auditor and Commissioner of General Land Office, furnished by Hon. J. A. Williamson, Commissioner of the General Land Office, at the request of your committee it appears:

That the governor of said State of Minnesota, on the 25th September, 1858, appointed two commissioners to make the selections of salt springs and lands to which the State was entitled by said act of February 26, 1857.

That said commissioners on the 27th of November, 1858, having made said selections according to instructions received from said governor in the letter of appointment, did on the 27th day of November, 1858, make report thereof to said governor.

That on the 1st day of December, 1858, said governor addressed a letter to the register and receiver of United States land office at Otter Tail City; accompanying the same was a list of the selections made by the commissioners; and that on the same day he also addressed a similar letter to Commissioner of General Land Office and requested that he would instruct local land officers to mark on tract-books the selections made; and that said Commissioner did on the 14th December, 1858, issue such instructions to said local land officers, as will appear from the following letter:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., December 14, 1858.

GENTLEMEN: His excellency the governor of Minnesota having advised this office that he had in a letter of the 1st instant designated to you the location of the twelve salt springs, with the land adjoining, to which the State is entitled under the provisions of the law of February 26, 1857, I have to request that you will mark upon the plats and tract-books, plainly and distinctly, those salt springs, with the land adjoining, as may fall within the limits of the Government surveys, and withhold them from entry or location until further advised by this office. Transcribe in one of your permanent records as much of the governor's report, giving the description of the locality of those salt springs, which are embraced in land not yet surveyed, so that when the plats of the townships which contain the said springs are received at your office and the tract-books open for entries no errors may occur in regard to the precise location of the springs.

Advise this office of the receipt of this letter.

Very respectfully,

THOMAS A. HENDRICKS,
Commissioner.

REGISTER AND RECEIVER,
Otter Tail, Minnesota.

Nothing further appears to have been done toward securing the title to these lands to the State till the 20th day of November, 1868, when the State auditor addressed a letter to Commissioner of the General Land Office, and to which he received the following reply:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., November 25, 1868.

SIR: I have to acknowledge yours of the 20th instant, making inquiry about the selections of salt-spring lands for the State of Minnesota.

In reply, I state that on the 1st of December, 1858, the governor of the State wrote to this office to the effect that he had written to the Otter Tail land office, designating "as nearly as possible" the location of the twelve salt springs, with the land adjoining or contiguous thereto, to which the State is entitled by the terms of the enabling act (so called) of Congress, approved February 26, 1857. In reply thereto we addressed a letter of instructions to the local officers at Otter Tail City to make such notes on their records as will clearly designate the lands selected, and to await further instructions. I inclose a copy of this letter.

No further action has been taken by the State authorities toward obtaining title to the lands, nor has this office issued any further instructions.

To bring the matter now properly before the Department, it is requested that the State will present, through the local officers, a list of the lands claimed for salt springs, with evidence of the existence of such springs; and if any of the springs are still in unsurveyed regions, diagrams should be forwarded showing their locality by proper metes and bounds. When these are received we will be enabled to take definite action.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOS. S. WILSON,
Commissioner.

Hon. CHARLES McILRATH,
Auditor and Land Commissioner, Saint Paul, Minnesota.

To which letter the State auditor made the following reply:

STATE OF MINNESOTA,
Land Office, Saint Paul, March 13, 1869.

SIR: In compliance with the instructions contained in your letter of the 25th of November, 1868, (89-419,) relating to the selections of salt-spring lands for the State of Minnesota, I herewith inclose the following papers, and respectfully request the action of the Department thereon, namely:

1. Copy of the affidavit of the commissioners who selected the said lands in 1858, certified to by the governor and attested by the secretary of said State, designating the lands by United States subdivisions where surveyed, and, where not surveyed, describing the same by metes and bounds.

2. Map of the lands, with field-notes of surveys by said commissioners, showing position of said springs in reference to United States section corners.

I have also sent to the local land office at Alexandria the copy of the letter from your office to the office at Otter Tail land office, dated December 14, 1858, requiring them to mark on their plats and tract-books said salt-spring lands, and accompanied same by a similar list to the one herewith transmitted, and diagram of the selections beyond the surveys.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHAS. McILRATH,
Commissioner State Land Office.

Hon. JOSEPH S. WILSON,
Commissioner General Land Office,
Washington, D. C.

NOVEMBER 27, 1858.

The following affidavit of Pierre Bottineau and James D. Skinner, commissioners heretofore appointed by the governor to select salt springs and lands, &c., for the State, were this day filed in this office, to wit:

STATE OF MINNESOTA,
County of Ramsey, ss:

Before me, a notary public in and for said county, personally came James D. Skinner and Pierre Bottineau, who, being duly sworn according to law, did depose and say that in the month of September last (1858) they were appointed by Henry H. Sibley, governor of the State of Minnesota, commissioners on the part of said State to select and mark out the twelve salt springs, with the land adjoining, granted by act of Congress approved February 26, 1857, to the said State; that they have discharged the duty thus imposed upon them, and have found salt springs on or adjacent to the following-described tracts or parcels of land included in the United States Government surveys, and which said tracts or parcels of land they have reported to the said governor, as claimed for and in behalf of said State under the act of Congress referred to, to wit: South half of section 21, south half of section 22, and sections 25, 26, 27, 34, and 35, in township 136 north, of range 45 west; sections 2, 3, 10, and 11, west half of section 1, west half of section 12, north half of section 14, north half of section 15, township 135, range 45; south half of section 20, south half of section 21, east half of section 30, east half of section 31, and sections 28, 29, 32, and 33, township 136, range 45; south half of section 19, south half of section 29, west half of section 28, and sections 30, 31, 32, and 29, and west half of section 33, township 136, range 44; sections 4, 5, and 9, east half of section 6, east half of section 7, and section 17, township 135, range 45; sections 12, 13, and north half of section 24, township 133, range 44; sections 1, 2, 11, and 12, north half of section 13, north half of section 14, township 135, range 46; sections 7, 18, and west half of section 8, north half of section 19, west half of section 20, township 133, range 43; west half of section 6, west half of section 7, township 135, range 45; sections 7 and 18, township 131, range 42; sections 12, 13, east half of section 11, east half of section 14, township 131, range 43; west half of section 5, west of section 17, township 131, range 44; section 6 and west half of section 5, township 131, range 42; west half of section 32, and section 31, in township 132, range 42; section 1 and section 2, township 131, range 43; section 35, township 132, range 43; also three salt springs outside of the lines of the Government surveys, with six sections of land to each, marked out by metes and bounds and described as eighteen sections of land lying south from the Wild Rice River, and traversed by the south branch of the said Wild Rice River, which arises along the eastern boundary of said tract, and closely adjoining and northwest from the crossing of the Red River trail so called. At said branch, posts were set and lines run out as per letter of instructions of the said governor, and a map or diagram of which selections accompanies this affidavit, marked A. And deponents further say that, according to the best of their knowledge and belief, no right to any of the said salt springs or lands claimed for the State as aforesaid has vested in any individual or individuals by reason of prior claim of settlement or pre-emption, or by any grant from the Government of the United States; that they have visited in person and examined said salt springs, and that they do exist on or adjacent to the lands above designated, and are of the kind or description contemplated by the act of Congress above referred to. And the said deponents further say that they have delivered to the said governor a general map of the country, which map or draught contains a designation of the particular location of the several salt springs so selected by them for the State as aforesaid, which correctly describes the location of the salt springs as they are marked on the said map or draught; and further deponents say not.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of the original affidavit as recorded in book "A" of the record journal of this State.

WM. R. MARSHALL,
Governor of Minnesota.

H. C. ROGERS, Secretary of State.

Accompanying and attached to the foregoing report of the commissioners there is a plat showing the location of the three salt springs which were located outside the surveyed limits, designating the same by metes and bounds, mounds, and stakes.

It further appears from list of selections furnished to your committee by Commissioner of General Land Office that all of the lands embraced in the foregoing report of commissioners, and which were located within the surveyed limits, were approved January 4, 1871, and certified to the State, except as shown in the following letter from Hon. J. A. Williamson, Commissioner of General Land Office:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 6, 1878.

SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of the 28th ultimo, received at this office the 4th instant, requesting further information relative to Minnesota salt springs selections and in compliance therewith I have the honor to submit the following statement of—

2d. Quantity of lands selected which are covered by adverse claims; and, 3. Quantity of lands selected which are not embraced in such adverse claims and which may be certified to the State as saline lines, viz:

The lands referred to in the report transmitted with my letter to you of the 19th ultimo, as having been selected June 6, 1870, as swamp lands, amounting in the aggregate to 120 acres, and the selection of lot 1 of section 7, township 131, range 42, containing 6.40 acres as school land cannot be considered as valid selections, the same having been made long subsequent to the date of the salt-springs selections. Hence the above are not included in the statement of interferences above.

The selection of the east half of section 10 and north half of section 14, township 135, range 45, for university purposes, May 7, 1872, was illegal, the said tracts having been approved to the State as saline lands, January 4, 1871. Hence the rescission of the tracts for university purposes was an error, and should not have been allowed. The paper submitted with your letter is herewith returned.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. A. WILLIAMSON,
Commissioner.

Hon. C. W. JONES,
United States Senate.

From the foregoing, it appears that of the selections made inside the surveyed limits, and which have not been approved, there is 3,437.61 acres, to which there is no adverse claim, and which can now be approved and certified to said State. It also appears that there is 3,394.75 acres which are covered by adverse claims, for the greater portion of which patents have already issued, and to which title cannot now be made to the State; and that the 3,394.75 acres represents six sections by Government subdivisions as originally selected.

The "three salt springs outside of the lines of the Government surveys with six sections of land to each," as described in the report and diagram of selections made by the commissioners, on examination, are found to be within the limits of the White Earth Indian reservation. The Indian title to the land embraced within the present limits of said reservation was ceded to the United States by the treaty of February 22, 1855, between the United States and the Chippewa Indians of the Mississippi. (U. S. Stats. at Large, vol. 10, pp. 1163, 1166.)

By the treaty with said Indians of March 20, 1855, they ceded certain reservations made in the treaty of February 22, 1855, and a new reservation was set apart for them which included a small portion of northern part of what is now White Earth reservation. (U. S. Stats. at Large, vol. 13, p. 693.)

By the treaty with said Indians proclaimed April 18, 1867, they ceded to the United States the reservation set apart by treaty of March 20, 1855, and in lieu thereof the United States set apart the White Earth reservation. (See art. 2, treaty Mar. 19, 1867, U. S. Stat. at Large, vol. 16, pp. 719, 720, 721.)

As a summary of the foregoing your committee find as follows:

That said lands were granted to said State by act of February 20, 1857; that the selection thereof by the commissioners appointed by the governor of said State was proper and made within the time limited by said act; that the governor of said State served due and proper notice of selections made on the Commissioner of General Land Office and local land officers; that the Commissioner of General Land Office issued instructions to local land officers to mark said selections on tract-books and permanent records of their office; that through oversight or negligence of the local land officers adverse claims were permitted to attach to six sections of the lands selected within the surveyed limits, so that the United States cannot now make title to the State thereto; that ten years after the selection of the three springs and eighteen sections of land adjoining thereto which were located outside the surveyed limits, the United States made a treaty with the Mississippi bands of Chippewa Indians, whereby there was set apart from lands to which the United States acquired title by the treaty of February 22, 1855, thirty-six townships of land as a reservation, and which is now known as the White Earth reservation, and within the limits of which these lands are located; that the United States cannot now make title thereto; that the total amount of said selections to which the United States cannot now make title to the State is twenty-four sections.

Your committee are therefore of opinion that the State of Minnesota should be permitted and authorized to the public lands of the United States, not otherwise appropriated, twenty-four sections of land in lieu of that amount of lands to which said State of Minnesota was entitled as aforesaid, and to which the United States cannot make title to said State of Minnesota.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of accompanying bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have somebody explain how it is that the grant of twelve salt springs to the State of Minnesota carries two sections of land with each salt spring, which appears to be the result of it, or perhaps more.

Mr. McDONALD. The quantity of land which is to go with each reservation is stated in the act.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us see the act.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think the Senator will find the answer to his question in the act referred to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the date of the act?

Mr. McMILLAN. February 26, 1857.

Mr. McDONALD. That part of the act is printed in the report.

Mr. McMILLAN. It is in the fourth subdivision of section 5.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is in volume 11 of the statutes, page 166:

That all salt springs within said State not exceeding twelve in number, with six sections of land adjoining or as contiguous as may be to each, shall be granted to said State for its use.

That is the clause; so that each spring carried six sections of land?

Mr. McDONALD. Yes, sir; and these are the sections that could not be obtained by reason of a subsequent reservation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. These two the governor located within the time, as I understand?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And on land to which there was then no adverse claim?

Mr. McDONALD. None, except that which the Government afterward conferred by the Indian reservation referred to in the report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then some of these springs that the governor located were not on land that was open to location?

Mr. McMILLAN. No, the lands were all subject to location; they came within the act of Congress; but a portion of the land was not surveyed. There were three springs with six sections contiguous to each that were not within the limits of the surveyed portion of the State of Minnesota, but they were within the limits of the State on unsurveyed lands—lands which had been ceded to the United States by the Indian treaty of 1855; but owing to the fact that a description could not be given by Government subdivisions they had to be described and identified as they are in the report of the commissioners appointed by the governor of Minnesota. The three springs, with six sections contiguous, were subsequently embraced within the White Earth Indian reservation by a treaty made with the Indians in 1867; so that the three springs, with six sections of land contiguous to each, are now embraced within that Indian reservation and subject to settlement by the Indians, the reservation being surveyed into forty-acre tracts, and the Indians permitted to settle upon them and cultivate them and hold them during their life, but the lands are not transferable from the Indians. By this treaty the State of Minnesota is deprived of her selection of eighteen sections of land embraced in the act authorizing the Territory to form a State government. The other six sections are lands upon which adverse claims have arisen since they were selected by the State of Minnesota by pre-emptors and others. A large number of them have obtained their titles, and the State has been deprived of her title to twenty-four sections of the land. For that amount of land this bill proposes to grant to the State of Minnesota land in lieu of it.

Mr. McDONALD. Within the limits of the State.

Mr. McMILLAN. Within the limits of the State.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not see how that could be; but very likely it is so. Here was the act of 1857, which granted to the State twelve salt springs with six sections of land adjoining to be located by the governor within a year, but he was not to locate upon any spring or land the right whereof was vested in any individual or which might be confirmed as belonging to anybody else. If he did locate upon land that was free and followed the law, within the year, and made his report to the proper land office, the title of the State, I should have said, became perfect, and no subsequent treaty or act of the United States could oust the title of the State.

Mr. McMILLAN. The selections were not perfected so as to require the Commissioner of the General Land Office to certify the title to the State, owing to the fact, perhaps, that the war intervened in 1861, and during the same period the local land office at Otter Tail, embracing the records upon which the selections were noted, was destroyed by fire, and of course the records were destroyed with the office.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that in the report of the committee?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes, sir; I think that is so stated in the communication.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not happen to notice that.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think that is in the report. It is the fact, I am sure.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator will not find it in the report, I guess.

Mr. McMILLAN. Perhaps it may not be stated in the report, but it appears among the records on file in the case, and I know that to be the fact. It appears among these records. All the facts stated in the report are authenticated by the official records of the State, and also those of the General Government in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This title, as it is stated, must have failed upon the ground that the governor located upon springs that he was not entitled to locate upon, and in that case the State would be entitled to no redress, (because they had fair warning by a proviso that they should be careful not to infringe upon anybody else, and to make their selection of clear titles within a year,) or else the defect in the title now must have arisen either from the wrong of the United States or the neglect of the State of Minnesota. It is said that the governor within the year appointed commissioners who made their selections and notified the proper land office. If that be so, as I said before, I am unable to perceive why the title of the State is not complete. If it be not so, then it is because the State failed to follow up that notice by the next step necessary, to have a proper description forwarded to the General Land Office so as to make their title complete. If it is the fault of the State, twenty years is rather a long time to correct that fault in favor of the party in default. If it is the fault of the United States, then of course it may present a different consideration.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. President, these salt springs were embraced, all of them, within the limits of the State. Three of them, as I before stated, were on the unsurveyed lands of the State. The land had been ceded by treaty to the United States in 1855, so that there was no Indian reservation at the time covering that portion of the State. The selection of these lands was made by commissioners appointed by the governor of the State, as is set forth in this report; and there is also set forth in the report a joint affidavit of two persons describing this selection very fully and minutely. The State did not obtain the title to those lands, and subsequently the United States entered into a treaty with the tribes of Indians in our State by which a portion of the land embracing these three salt springs and the land contiguous to them was incorporated into the White Earth Indian reservation. That Indian reservation has been established; it is occupied by the Indians now; the agent of the United States is settled upon it; and all the operations of the Government are conducted there so far as they are connected with those Indians. The State cannot certainly obtain any title to those lands now. The Indians are settled upon those lands and each of them has a right to cultivate forty acres of land and obtain a title to it during his life.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Are the springs actually there on the reservation?

Mr. McMILLAN. The springs are on the reservation and the lands contiguous to them are all embraced in the reservation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Are they actual salt springs?

Mr. McMILLAN. I never was there, but they are so reported. Here is the evidence before the Senate; and it is very full and distinct.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. That is the presumption.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, the presumption is that all springs are salt where there is a land grant.

Mr. McMILLAN. Where the lands are granted in connection with salt springs and the Government has certified one-half the lands it is to be presumed that they are salt springs.

In addition to that, here is an affidavit of the persons who selected the lands; and they state that—

They were appointed by Henry H. Sibley, governor of the State of Minnesota, commissioners on the part of said State to select and mark out the twelve salt springs, with the land adjoining, granted by act of Congress, approved February 26, 1857, to the said State; that they have discharged the duty thus imposed upon them, and have found salt springs on or adjacent to the following-described tracts or parcels of land included in the United States Government surveys, and which said tracts or parcels of lands they have reported to the said governor, as claimed for and in behalf of said State under the act of Congress.

Then they go on and describe the springs and lands within the surveyed limits of the State:

Also three salt springs outside of the lines of the Government surveys, with six sections of land to each, marked out by metes and bounds and described as eighteen sections of land lying south from the Wild Rice River, and traversed by the south branch of the said Wild Rice River, which arises along the eastern boundary of said tract, and closely adjoining and northwest from the crossing of the Red River trail, (so called.) At said branch points were set and lines run out as per letter of instructions of the said governor, and a map or diagram of which selections accompanies this affidavit, marked A.

And they go on with the other facts.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask my honorable friend a question? It seems there were three springs wanting. The act granted to the State all the salt springs there were in the State not exceeding twelve. The State therefore has got nine, I suppose. Is there a single salt spring of the nine that is now worked as a salt spring, or is known as such, for any operation connected with salt?

Mr. McMILLAN. I am unaware of the facts in regard to these springs, except that I do know the State made a grant of one for a public purpose in the State with the six sections of lands adjoining.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What was the public purpose, working salt?

Mr. McMILLAN. No, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, I guess not.

Mr. McMILLAN. I forget the purpose. I know the party to whom the grant was made in our State. It was made by an act of the Legislature to a citizen of our own State.

Mr. McDONALD. As a saline grant this is just the same as the grants which were accepted by every State, nearly, west of the Ohio River, beginning with Ohio, and Indiana, and Illinois, and continued on. The lands have always been selected and the proper use made of them. What became of the springs, I do not know.

Mr. McMILLAN. In addition to that, I am also advised that this grant of land will pass to the State University under the action of our State. The lands granted under this bill will go to aid the State University. The State has disposed of the grant in that direction.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As a land grant to the State of Minnesota of two-thirds of a township of land in aid of a university the thing certainly has an appearance of merit. I should be glad to have a similar grant of lands in Minnesota for the benefit of the University of Vermont. But as making up, as an act of duty under this measure, a loss of an actual salt spring to the State of Minnesota, I am bound to say that I must be excused for having any faith in that sort of thing. My honorable friend says, and he understands it, that as far as he knows there is not a single one of the other nine springs that was ever used as a salt spring at all. One of them was granted to somebody else for some other purpose, some other good public purpose no doubt.

Mr. McMILLAN. I will answer the Senator that one of them was granted to a company in our State organized for the manufacture of salt.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That was probably the best spring. Now, can the Senator tell us how much salt that company produced?

Mr. McMILLAN. I am not informed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Did the Senator ever hear of its producing any?

Mr. McMILLAN. I have not informed myself in regard to that fact, I will say to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from Vermont, perhaps by way of a question. I wish to know whether the grant originally of these sections of salt-spring land depended at all upon their ever making salt.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know. The Senator can read English probably just as well as I can. What the statute says is—

That all salt springs within said State not exceeding twelve in number, with six sections of land adjoining or as contiguous as may be to each, shall be granted to said State for its use.

If that meant that it was a salted spring in order to give the State so much more land for its general purposes, that is one thing; but if it meant what the unsophisticated mind of an honest man would suppose it to mean, that it was granted like salt springs in the State of New York, for the public benefit, to supply people with salt and to be managed and controlled by the sovereignty of the State, then it would have said exactly what it does say. But the obvious fact is, plainly enough, after this explanation, that the State of Minnesota never did select twelve salt springs or any other number of salt springs within the fair meaning of that act, as I have described what I understand its meaning to be. It did get a certain amount of land and dispose of it for all sorts of purposes, never for the purposes of salt springs but on one occasion it seems, and that appears, so far as we know, to have been a failure. Now, then, after twenty years, it is proposed to take two-thirds of a township to be given to a university under color of making up three salt springs which have in the course of time disappeared if they ever existed. Of course, Mr. President, the Senate will pass the bill; it is always generous.

Mr. McDONALD. The Senator who reported this bill [Mr. JONES, of Florida] is not in his seat to-day. The original bill was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and by the committee referred to the Senator from Florida as a subcommittee, and he gave this question very careful consideration, as the report will show. The facts which the report discloses certainly establish this: that there were twenty-four sections of land granted to the State of Minnesota at the time of her admission into the Union as a State, to which she has never received a title, owing to the subsequent disposition of the lands by the Government, embracing eighteen sections of these lands, for an Indian reservation, and the balance making up the twenty-four sections of land covered by adverse claims acquired to the property after this grant was made.

The committee thought, under all the circumstances, that it was right and fair to the State of Minnesota to let her be remunerated for these lands, thus otherwise disposed of, by selecting the same number of sections within the limits of the State of public lands not now sold. The character of this grant is not new to the State of Minnesota. The same class of grants have been made to all the States in the Northwest. I know it was so in my own State. We have to this day a saline fund, forming a part of the common-school fund of our State, which sprang from the disposal of the lands that were granted to the State of Indiana in connection with the salt springs. I do not suppose there is a single spring in the State of Indiana that is now used or worked for the purpose of manufacturing salt, and perhaps none ever was to any very great extent, but it was among the perquisites which the General Government saw proper to tender to the people of a Territory when they were forming themselves into a State for the purpose of assuming the responsibilities of a State government, and we thought it was nothing more than fair in the case of Minnesota that, having been deprived in this way of this perquisite, to that extent she should be allowed to make it up in lands inside of her own limits. If the Senator who made this report were present, he could state much more in detail the circumstances that led to this conclusion than I can.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The facts are all stated in the report; all the report lacks is salt.

Mr. McDONALD. But the salt has lost its savor.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. As the Senator from Indiana has remarked, this is no new species of grants. Most of the Northwestern States, if not all, have had grants of this kind connected with salt springs. The grant was not made because it was known that salt could be made at those springs, but because it was believed there was a fair prospect of obtaining salt. It was the general opinion that where salt springs were found, although the waters might not be strong enough for practical working as they came to the surface, yet by boring, salt might be found there. It was on a supposition of this kind that the grants were made. There were several salt springs in Michigan in connection with which similar grants were made; but it was found by experience that salt could not be obtained by boring, they were not within what is called the salt basin; and those lands have all been disposed of to individuals. Suppose it should turn out that there was no salt to be found in any of these cases, either in Michigan or in any of the other States, does the title to this land fail? If the argument of the Senator from Vermont is good for anything, the title must have failed because they failed to find waters salt enough to be worked for the making of salt. It does seem to me that there is nothing in the point raised by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know that there is, because the point really is a little difficultly that I have in giving to the State of Minnesota two-thirds of a township of land for the purposes of a university, for that is what it comes to, to which she has not any claim, and never had; because all that was given to her was a salt spring. That is perfectly apparent to my mind. But the answer of my friend from Michigan has a great deal of force, I admit. He says if boring will do it, then the title is good; but this happens to be boring for land instead of salt, and I have no doubt it will fetch the result.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported from the Committee on Public Lands.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SAMSON GOLIAH.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 1096) for the relief of Samson Goliah; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill revokes the sentence of the general court-martial in the case of Samson Goliah, late a private in company A, Fifty-fifth Regiment of Massachusetts Volunteers, (colored,) finding him guilty of mutiny, and sentencing him to confinement at hard labor during the remainder of his term of service, to forfeit all pay and allowances due or to become due, and to be dishonorably discharged the service of the United States, promulgated in General Orders No. 136, of September 19, 1864, headquarters of the Department of the South.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Is there a report in that case?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a report.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I should like to hear it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. MAXEY on the 16th instant:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Samson Goliah, late a private Company A, Fifty-fifth Massachusetts Colored Regiment, respectfully submit the following report:

Samson Goliah is a colored man. He was formerly, as shown by his sworn petition, a slave. He "was tried by general court-martial on the charge of mutiny, found guilty, and sentenced to be confined at hard labor for the remainder of his term of enlistment, to forfeit all pay and allowances then due or to become due, and then to be dishonorably discharged the service of the United States." (See transcript from Adjutant-General's Office, on file in this case.)

Of the proceedings of the court-martial, the Judge-Advocate-General says they appear to be regular, and the sentence also.

He states that the relief asked is beyond the power of the Executive Department, and that Congress alone has authority to indemnify the party for any injustice or undue punishment that he may have suffered, and it is to that branch of the Government that his appeal should be addressed. The sentence of the general court-martial in Goliah's case was promulgated under General Orders No. 136, of September 19, 1864, headquarters Department of the South, and under that sentence he was sent to Fort Clinch, Florida, September, 1864, to serve out his sentence, but his regiment, the record states, having been mustered out of service, he was released and dishonorably discharged before he had served the full time specified.

The sentence was severe, if not harsh, under any circumstances, and in the case of Samson Goliah was, in the judgment of the committee, altogether too harsh. He was, as shown by his sworn statement, born and raised a slave. "Ignorance of the law excuseth not" is a maxim the committee recognizes, but the committee submits that that maxim has never been extended beyond its plain import. Ignorance of law cannot be pleaded in justification or excuse, but under the general issue proof thereof would be clearly admissible in mitigation. Here the man had been born and reared a slave. In the very nature of things his knowledge of law must have been exceedingly limited. The law is not a bed of Procrustes, and he who so regards it knows nothing of its philosophy. This fact does not, so far as the transcript goes, appear to have been considered at all. It might well have been considered by the court-martial and by the final reviewing officers. It was not, nor does it seem to have been considered by the Adjutant-General or Secretary of War, who suggest that this is not a meritorious case for any action by Congress.

This question is one, the committee submits, upon which it differs with those officers. A point which the Adjutant-General makes against the man Samson Goliah is, that he stated that he received an honorable discharge and that it was burned in the law office of John W. Blake, at Indianapolis, (when that office was burned in March, 1874,) when in fact it was a dishonorable discharge. This point is by no means conclusive when we come to consider that he was without education; that he had to make his mark to the affidavit; that he was raised a slave, and in all likelihood did not know one sort of paper discharge from another. But the story told by Samson in his petition under consideration bears evidence of truth and candor.

Samson states that the trouble originated on board a propeller going from Jacksonville, Florida, to Hilton Head, South Carolina, out of a slight disturbance after taps. That one John Sylvester made the disturbance because he was hungry. No doubt John was hungry. Goliah says that he and John were lying together in the hold of the vessel; not a very comfortable place; that Lieutenant Bean, the officer on duty, came to him (Samson) and charged him (Goliah) with making a noise. Samson denied. Bean said he would arrest him. (Samson Goliah.) Goliah in his wrath said he would not be arrested, because he had done nothing. Doubtless this was wrong. Samson should have curbed his angry passions, and Goliah should have shown Christian meekness. Still there was human nature in it, and a good deal of it. The biblical history of the two remarkable men whose joint names he bears may have been read to him by the light of pine knots in his lowly cabin when he was a slave, and the unhappy man may have been emulating their illustrious and, as he supposed, righteous examples. At all events a better educated man than Goliah, a white man, raised under the shadows of the temple of justice, would, if a spirited man, have proved refractory. How much more reason for believing this ignorant negro, who believed his rights invaded, was honest in his refusal to be arrested. However, Bean and his guards did finally arrest him, and there was no one to give the note of warning—"The Philistines be upon thee, Samson." He was taken on deck and tied to the mast. Here the real trouble began. His friends finding out what had been done (they were colored like himself) raised a row and cut him loose. So his strength was not known. That is just what his people would have done if they believed he had been wronged. Samson says he remained on deck all night, and the next morning Lieutenant Bean came to him and told him that if he would get down on his knees and beg pardon he would release him and send him to his company. Samson, to his honor be it said, refused.

He states that charges were preferred, that he was tried, had no means of defense, or of getting witnesses; that he was utterly ignorant of what a court or court-martial was. He states that at Fort Clinch, under his sentence, he did double duty at hard labor until he was sent to his regiment.

Samson produces the affidavits of John H. Martin, George Johnson, Hamilton Curry, and William Jones, who state that they were on board; know of the disturbance; know it was raised by Sylvester and not by Samson, and know that he was a good and obedient soldier; that they complained to Sylvester; that he (Sylvester) was the man who created the disturbance, and not Samson, and that Sylvester admitted it to him; that Sylvester is dead, died at Indianapolis a few days after he returned from the Army after his discharge. Three other men, Nathan Lane, James Rhodes, and Solomon Moss, swear they were also on board at the time of the disturbance; that Sylvester was the man who made the noise, and they know it, and that Sylvester at different times confessed he was the guilty party, and that Samson was an orderly, obedient, and faithful soldier. It may be asked why was not this testimony produced on the trial? The answer is, the man on trial was a poor, ignorant negro, who had been raised a slave, was under arrest, and knew not the methods of the law. Samson files the statement of a number of citizens of Indianapolis that they have known him since the war, and that he is an orderly, industrious, faithful citizen. The attorney of Samson, John W. Blake, esq., of Indianapolis, is fully indorsed by the late Senator Morton, in a letter to the Secretary of War dated March 10, 1877. Mr. Blake says Samson is a faithful man, with a wife and four children, and is too poor to employ counsel; that he (Blake) has aided him in prosecuting his claim without fee or reward, and is prompted by friendship.

Upon the whole case, the committee is of opinion that Samson has suffered enough, wherefore the committee recommends that the sentence of the general court-martial in the case of Samson Goliah, late private Company A, Fifty-fifth Massachusetts Volunteers, colored, promulgated in General Orders No. 136, of September 19, 1864, headquarters Department of the South, be set aside; that the order or discharge dishonorably discharging him from the Army be revoked, and that the Secretary of War be directed to grant him an honorable discharge, to bear date as of the date of said dishonorable discharge, and the committee recommends the passage of the accompanying bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MILITARY POST IN THE BLACK HILLS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 785) to provide for building a military post for the protection of the citizens of the Black Hills region; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It appropriates $150,000 for the purpose of building a military post or garrison at the foot-hills near the Black Hills, in either of the Territories of Wyoming or Dakota, at such point in that region as may be, in the judgment of the President, best adapted for the protection of the citizens of the Black Hills country from the hostile incursions of the Sioux and other Indian tribes congregated or operating in that locality.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to know whether the bill has been recommended by the War Department.

Mr. MAXEY. I will state that it was recommended by the proper authorities of the War Department, and very urgently, and that the bill passed the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate unanimously. There is a report in writing accompanying the bill, which can be read.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I should like to hear the report in the case. This is appropriating a large amount of money and, it strikes me, unnecessarily.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the report.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think the bill had better go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill goes over under objection.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, subsequently said: Upon the explanation of two Senators, I withdraw my objection to the bill, but I should like to have the report read.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask that the report be read. There is an urgent necessity for the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumes the consideration of the bill, and the report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. SPENCER on the 16th instant:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 785) to provide for building a military post for the protection of the citizens of the Black Hills region, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

Your committee, wishing to be apprised of the necessity for constructing a military post, as contemplated by the bill, addressed the honorable Secretary of War on the subject of date of February 26, 1878, to which the following reply has been received:

WAR DEPARTMENT, WASHINGTON CITY,
March 6, 1878.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 26th ultimo, inclosing Senate bill 785, "to provide for building a military post for the protection of the citizens of the Black Hills region," and requesting the Committee on Military Affairs to be advised as to the propriety of the passage of said bill, and beg to inform the committee that this bill is approved by the General of the Army, who reports upon the subject as follows:

"We must keep pace with our rapidly growing frontier; valuable mines now exist and are being developed in the Black Hills of Wyoming.

"Incidental thereto, farms and ranches are being opened (necessarily scattered and exposed to Indian depredations,) which will need military protection. Troops cannot exist in that region without shelter, and therefore a post seems necessary.

"The amount, $150,000, is deemed ample."

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEO. W. MCCRARY,
Secretary of War.

Hon. GEORGE E. SPENCER,

Chairman Committee on Military Affairs, United States Senate.

Inasmuch as the Secretary of War advises your committee that the bill is approved by the General of the Army, who considers the construction of such a military post in the region indicated necessary for the protection of the citizens of the Black Hills country and for the shelter of troops, also that the sum of $150,000 is deemed ample for such purpose, your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have listened to the reading of the report. The whole thing is based upon the recommendation of the General of the Army. We have no information as to how far distant are any of the forts or military stations that are now existing in that country. There is Fort Laramie somewhere out in that country, not a very great distance from the Black Hills, I presume.

Mr. ALLISON. Only about two hundred miles.

Mr. SAULSBURY. We have no information now as to the number of troops that would be required to garrison the fort; and the report is not to my mind entirely satisfactory. We have no information from the General of the Army or from the War Department as to whether there is any absolute necessity to keep troops stationed at that point. There may be a great necessity for it, but the report does not show any such necessity. I should like to have some information upon the subject before we vote $150,000 out of the public Treasury for this purpose; and I think the bill had better go over, so that we can obtain further information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware makes an objection, and the Secretary will report the next bill on the Calendar.

ISSUE OF ARMS TO TERRITORIES.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3697) to amend a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue arms, approved July 3, 1876; which was read.

Mr. ALLISON. That is not clear. It would be necessary to have the statute read in order to understand how it is proposed to amend it. I object to the consideration of the bill at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa objects to the bill, and it goes over.

ALCOHOL FOR SCIENTIFIC PURPOSES.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1887) to extend the provisions of section 3297 of the Revised Statutes to other institutions of learning; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to grant permits, as provided for in section 3297 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, to any scientific university or college of learning created and constituted such by any State or Territory under its laws, though not incorporated or chartered, upon the same terms and subject to the same restrictions and penalties already provided by section 3297.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next bill on the Calendar will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next bill on the Calendar is the bill (S. No. 1015) extending the time to construct and complete the Northern Pacific Railroad; which was reported adversely from the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. MITCHELL. As that matter has been acted upon by the Senate, I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 4658) for the relief of the public schools of the District of Columbia; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask the consent of the Senate to take up the bill which has just been received from the House of Representatives for the purpose of present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the bill was read twice, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the commissioners of the District of Columbia to retain and use for the maintenance of the public schools of the District for the remainder of the current school year $75,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, out of any moneys due to the United States from the District under the provisions of the seventeenth section of the act approved March 3, 1877; but the sum named shall not be considered as in addition to the proportion of the expenses of the District of Columbia hereafter to be assumed by the United States, but shall be a part thereof.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now let us hear the section of the law read.

Mr. WINDOM. I have consulted a majority of the Committee on Appropriations, and I believe all who are present of the committee unanimously recommend the passage of the bill. Section 17 of the act of March 3, 1877, referred to in the bill is as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to advance to said commissioners, between the 1st day of July and the 1st day of November, 1877, such sums as may be from time to time required for the payment of interest on the old funded debt and for the current expenses of the District government, the aggregate sum so advanced not to exceed $400,000; and the commissioners shall reimburse the Treasury the amount so advanced out of the revenues of the District on or before the expiration of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878.

The sum of $400,000 for the purpose of reimbursing the advances made by the Government under this section is in the Treasury, and the bill proposes to authorize the use of $75,000 of that fund to aid in keeping open the schools of the District.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator mean to say that this $400,000 has been reimbursed and is in the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. WINDOM. I mean to say that it is at the command of the District commissioners.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Ah yes, not repaid to the Treasury.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not understand that it has been repaid, but it is ready to be reimbursed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So that this bill provides available funds for the purpose of the schools?

Mr. WINDOM. It does, as I understand it.

Mr. BAILEY. I wish to ask the Senator from Minnesota a question. Do I understand that this money has been refunded to the Government of the United States? My reason for the inquiry is this: I understood, from the discussion which took place the other day at the other end of the Capitol, that it was announced by the commissioners that they did not expect to repay this money to the United States. For that reason I ask the Senator from Minnesota whether the Committee on Appropriations has any well-founded expectation that this money will be repaid to the Government?

Mr. WINDOM. I answer for myself that I have no very sanguine expectation in that direction. I do not think it ought to be repaid, and I do not very much expect that it will be.

Mr. BAILEY. Then I should like to know why the people of the United States are required to pay the expenses of the District of Columbia. I understand that the sole ground for this expenditure is a claim that the people here are so heavily taxed that they cannot afford to support their own school system; but I can say that the rate of taxation in the District of Columbia is not nearly so great as it is in many of the States of the Union. It is not nearly so great as it is in my own State in many of the towns and municipalities. In the little town in which I live we pay at least 1 per cent. more tax per annum than they pay here in the city of Washington. In the cities of that State and in many of the cities of the Union they pay twice and three times the rate of taxation that is paid in Washington; and no claim to be exempted from this burden that falls upon the people of other cities and other communities can be founded upon the idea that the rate of taxation here is so great that it is impossible for the people to support their own schools. I cannot understand why in the city of Washington there should be a claim upon the public Treasury of the United States for the support of common schools that does not exist in other communities, in other towns and places besides the city of Washington.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Shall the bill be ordered to a third reading?

The question being put, a division was called for.

Mr. DORSEY. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ROLLINS. Let us take the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On the third reading is just as well.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McDONALD, (when the name of Mr. VOORHEES was called.) My colleague [Mr. VOORHEES] is detained from the Senate by important engagements, which he could not avoid.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 42, nays 7; as follows:

So the bill was ordered to a third reading.

It was read the third time, and passed.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Resuming the Calendar, the next bill in order is the bill (H. R. No. 805) to repeal all that part of the act approved January 14, 1875, known as the resumption act, which authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of United States bonds and redeem and cancel the greenback currency; which was read by its title.

Mr. BAYARD. That had better lie over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill, being objected to, goes over.

Mr. FERRY. In this connection I desire to give notice that I shall ask the Senate to consider House bill No. 805, which was reported by the Committee on Finance with amendments on Wednesday. The committee have reported amendments to it, and I shall ask the Senate at one o'clock on Wednesday next to consider the bill and amendments.

GAMBLING IN THE ARMY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 112) to make an additional article of war; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the following be, and hereby is, made an additional article of war for the government of the Army of the United States: "Any officer serving with troops or any soldier not on furlough, who gambles, bets, or plays for money or other valuable stake or consideration at any game of cards or otherwise, shall be brought to trial by court-martial, and, upon conviction, punished as follows: If an officer, by dismissal from the military service, or such other punishment of less grade as may be inflicted by the sentence of the court-martial; if a soldier, at the discretion of the court: Provided, however, That any officer of the Army, whether or not serving with troops, who, by gambling, betting, or playing at cards or otherwise, shall win money from a junior or inferior officer, shall, upon conviction by a court-martial, be punished as hereinbefore provided in the case of an officer serving with troops.

SEC. 2. That any post trader who shall keep, have, let, or allow to be used in his trading store or establishment, or elsewhere, any building, room, or other place in which gambling, betting, or playing, for money or other valuable stake or consideration, at cards or otherwise, is, on any occasion, engaged in by officers or soldiers of the Army, either with each other or with civilians, shall have his appointment forthwith revoked by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 3. That it shall be, and is hereby made, the duty of every commanding officer of a post, station, detachment, or other place or body of troops strictly to enforce the provisions of this act by forthwith bringing to trial any soldier of his command who shall offend against the provisions of the first section, and by promptly reporting to the department commander, or, if there be none, to the Secretary of War, with a formal charge or charges preferred by him against the offender, any case of an officer of his command so offending. And it is further made the duty of every such commanding officer promptly to report to the Secretary of War any act or allowance on the part of a post trader at his post or station of the nature indicated in the second section. And for any failure or omission to comply with any of these injunctions, such commander shall be brought to trial as for a violation of the sixty-second article of war.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question being put, a division was called for; which resulted—ayes 29, noes 6; no quorum voting.

Mr. EDMUNDS, Mr. MITCHELL, and Mr. BURNSIDE called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. HILL. I should like to hear the bill reported again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be again read.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill, and having read the first section,

Mr. HILL. The Secretary need read no further on my account.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to move to strike out the words "or otherwise" in the first section where they first occur.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why so?

Mr. HOAR. It makes every bet of the smallest character undergo this heavy penalty.

Mr. MAXEY. I will state that this proposed law is the same as the corresponding law in regard to the Navy. The Committee on Military Affairs were of the opinion that for the first offense dismissal was, to say the least of it, rather severe; and, hence, gave the court-martial power to take into consideration surrounding circumstances, thus making a less penalty than dismissal for the first offense if the court thought it was proper and right to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question on the third reading of the bill will be regarded as reconsidered for the purpose of amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that as the article is drawn it punishes by dismissal from the military service, or such other punishment as may be inflicted by the sentence of a court-martial, all bets of every kind, not merely a bet which accompanies a game of cards or gambling, but the most indifferent matter. It seems to me it is a very severe penalty.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I thought the words "or otherwise" referred to otherwise gaming, "at any game of cards, or otherwise," that is, some other game. I suggest to the Senator to make it read:

At any game of cards or other game of chance or hazard.

Mr. HOAR. That is better. I will accept that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

Mr. CONOVER. I object to the present consideration of the bill. I think there are a good many unjust features in it, and many of us want more time to consider the measure. The Senator who reported the bill is not in his seat, neither is the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. I therefore object to the further consideration of the bill to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill being objected to goes over.

THOMAS M. SIMMONS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask leave to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. No. 1067) for the relief of Thomas M. Simmons was passed to-day. It is an Army claims bill, and it seems to include damages as well as a contract, and, on looking at the report, opens some doubt in my mind whether this was a case of contract and I should like to enter a motion to reconsider until it can be examined.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 4658) for the relief of the public schools of the District of Columbia; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.
